CHAPTER I.

"Good morrow, sweet Hero."

SHAKSPEARE.

When Mr. Effingham determined to return home, he sent orders to his agent to prepare his town house in New York for his reception, intending to pass the winter in it, and to visit his country residence when the spring should fairly open. Accordingly, Eve now found herself at the head of one of the largest establishments in the largest American town, within an hour after she had landed from the ship. Fortunately for her, however, her father was too just to consider a wife or a daughter a mere upper servant; and he rightly judged that a liberal portion of his income should be assigned to the procuring of that higher quality of domestic service, which can alone relieve the mistress of a household from a burthen so heavy to be borne. Unlike so many of those around him, who would spend on a single pretending and comfortless entertainment, in which the ostentatious folly of one contends with the ostentatious folly of another, a sum that, properly directed, would introduce order and system into a family for a twelvemonth, by commanding the time and knowledge of those whose study they had been, and who would be willing to devote themselves to such objects, and who would then permit their wives and daughters to return to the drudgery to which the sex seems doomed in this country: he first be-thought him of the base of social life, before he aspired to its parade. As a man of the world, Mr. Effingham possessed the requisite knowledge, and as a man of justice, the requisite fairness, to permit those who depended on him so much for their happiness, to share equitably in the good things that Providence had so liberally bestowed on himself. In other words, he made two people comfortable by paying a generous price for a housekeeper; his daughter, in the first place, by releasing her from cares that, necessarily, formed no more a part of her duties than it would be a part of her duty to sweep the pavement before the door; and, in the next place, a very respectable woman, who was glad to obtain so good a home on such easy terms. To this simple and just expedient, Eve was indebted for being at the head of one of the quietest, most truly elegant, and best ordered establishments in America, with no other demand on her time than that which was necessary to issue a few orders in the morning, and to examine a few accounts once a week.

One of the first, and the most acceptable of the visits that Eve received, was from her cousin Grace Van Courtlandt, who was in the country at the moment of her arrival, but who hurried back to town to meet her old schoolfellow and kinswoman, the instant she heard of her having landed. Eve Effingham and Grace Van Courtlandt were sisters' children, and had been born within a month of each other. As the latter was without father or mother, most of their time had been passed together, until the former was taken abroad, when a separation unavoidably ensued. Mr. Effingham ardently desired, and had actually designed to take his niece with him to Europe; but her paternal grandfather, who was still living, pleaded his years and his affection in opposition to the scheme, and it was reluctantly abandoned. This grandfather was now dead; and Grace had been left, with a very ample fortune, almost entirely the mistress of her own movements.

The moment of the meeting between the two warm-hearted and sincerely attached young women, was one of great interest and anxiety to both. They retained for each other the tenderest love, though the years that had separated them had given rise to so many new impressions and habits, that they did not prepare themselves for the interview without apprehensions. This interview took place about a week after Eve was established in State Street, and at an hour earlier than was usual for the reception of visits. Hearing a carriage stop before the door, and the bell ring, our heroine stole a glance from behind a curtain, and recognized her cousin as she alighted.

"Qu'avez-vous, ma chère?" demanded Mademoiselle Vieffville, observing that her élève trembled and grew pale.

"It is my cousin, Miss Van Courtlandt, she whom I loved as a sister; we now meet for the first time, after so many years!"

"Bien, c'est une très-jolie jeune personne!" returned the governess, taking a glance from the spot Eve had just quitted. "Sous le rapport de la personne, ma chère, vous devriez être contente au moins."

“ If you will excuse me, mademoiselle, I will go down alone. I think I should prefer to meet Grace without witnesses in the first interview.”

“ Très-volontiers.—Elle est parente, et c’est bien naturel.”

Eve, on this expressed approbation, met her maid at the door, as she came to announce that Mademoiselle de Courtlandt was in the library, and descended slowly to receive her. The library was lighted from above by means of a small dome, and Grace had unconsciously placed herself in the very position that a painter would have chosen had she been about to sit for her portrait. A strong, full, rich light fell obliquely on her as Eve entered, displaying her fine person and beautiful features to the very best advantage; and they were features and a person that are not seen every day, even in a country where female beauty is so common. She was in a carriage dress, and her toilette was rather more elaborate than Eve had been accustomed to see at that hour; but still Eve thought she had seldom beheld a more lovely young creature. Some such idea, also, passed through the mind of Grace herself; who, though struck, with a woman’s readiness in such matters, by the severe simplicity of Eve’s attire, as well as by its entire elegance, was more struck with the charms of her countenance and figure. There was, in truth, a strong resemblance between them, though each was distinguished by an expression suited to her character, and to the habits of her mind.

“ Miss Effingham !” said Grace, advancing a step to meet the lady who entered, while her voice was scarcely audible, and her limbs trembled.

“ Miss Van Courtlandt !” said Eve in the same low smothered tone.

This formality caused a chill in both, and each unconsciously stopped and curtsied. Eve had been so much impressed with the coldness of the American manner in the week she had been at home, and Grace was so sensitive on the subject of the opinion of one who had seen so much of Europe, that there was great danger, at that critical moment, that the meeting would terminate unpropitiously.

Thus far, however, all had been rigidly decorous, though the strong feelings that were glowing in the bosoms of both had been so completely suppressed. But the smile, cold and embarrassed as it was, that each gave as she curtsied, had the sweet character of her childhood in it, and recalled to both the girlish and affectionate intercourse of their younger days.

“ Grace !” said Eve, eagerly advancing a step or two impetuously, and blushing like the dawn.

“Eve!”

Each opened her arms, and in a moment they were locked in a long and fervent embrace. This was the revival of their former intimacy; and before night Grace was domesticated in her uncle's house. It is true that Miss Effingham perceived certain peculiarities about Miss Van Courtlandt that she would rather had been absent; and Miss Van Courtlandt would have felt more at her ease, had Miss Effingham had a little less reserve of manner on certain subjects that the latter had been taught to think interdicted.

Notwithstanding these slight separating shades in character, however, their mutual affection was warm and sincere; and if Eve, according to Grace's notions, was a little stately and formal, she was polished and courteous; and if Grace, according to Eve's notions, was a little too easy and unreserved, she was feminine and delicate.

We pass over the three or four days that succeeded, during which Eve had begun to understand her new position, and we will come at once to a conversation between the cousins, that will serve to let the reader more intimately into the opinions, habits, and feelings of both, as well as to open the real subject of our narrative. This conversation took place in that very library which had witnessed their first interview, soon after breakfast, and while the young ladies were still alone.

“I suppose, Eve, you will have to visit the Greens. They are Hajjis, and were much in society last winter.”

“Hajjis! You surely do not mean, Grace, that they have been to Mecca?”

“Not at all: only to Paris, my dear. That makes a Hajji in New York.”

“And does it entitle the pilgrim to wear the green turban?” asked Eve, laughing.

“To wear anything, Miss Effingham; green, blue, or yellow, and to cause it to pass for elegance.”

“And which happens to be the favourite colour with the family you have mentioned?”

“It ought to be the first, in compliment to the name; but, if truth must be said, I think they betray an affection for all, with not a few of the half tints in addition.”

“I am afraid they are too prononcées for us by this description. I am no great admirer, Grace, of walking rainbows.”

“Too Green you would have said, had you dared; but you are a Hajji too, and even the Greens know that a Hajji never puns,—unless, indeed, it be one from Philadelphia. But you will visit these people?”

“Certainly, if they are in society, and render it necessary by their own civilities.”

“They are in society in virtue of their rights as Hajjis; but, as they passed three months in Paris, you probably know something of them.”

“They may not have been there at the same time with ourselves,” returned Eve quietly; “and Paris is a very large city. Hundreds of people come and go of whom one never hears. I do not remember the family you have mentioned.”

“I wish you may escape them; for, in my untravelled judgment, they are anything but agreeable, notwithstanding all they have seen, or pretend to have seen.”

“It is very possible to have been all over Christendom, and to remain exceedingly disagreeable; besides, one may see a great deal, and yet see a very little of a good quality.”

A pause of two or three minutes followed, during which Eve read a note, and her cousin played with the leaves of a book.

“I wish I knew your real opinion of us, Eve,” suddenly exclaimed the last. “Why not be frank with so near a relative? tell me honestly, are you reconciled to your country?”

“You are the eleventh person who has asked me this question, which I think very extraordinary, as I have never quarrelled with my country.”

“Nay, I do not mean exactly that. I wish to know how our society strikes one who has been educated abroad.”

“You wish, then, for opinions that can have no great value, since my experience at home extends only to a fortnight. But you have many books on the country, and some written by very clever persons; why not consult them?”

“Oh, you mean the travellers! None of them are worth a second thought; and we hold them, one and all, in great contempt.”

“Of that I can have no manner of doubt, as, one and all, you are constantly protesting it, in the high-ways and by-ways. There is no more certain sign of contempt than to be incessantly dwelling on its intensity.”

Grace had great quickness as well as her cousin. Though provoked at Eve’s quiet hit, she had the good sense and good nature to laugh.

“Perhaps we do protest our disdain a little too strenuously for good taste, if not to gain believers; but surely, Eve, you do not support these travellers in all that they have written of us?”

“Not in half, I can assure you. My father and cousin Jack have discussed them too often in my presence, to leave me in ignorance of the very many political blunders they have made, in particular.”

“Political blunders! I know nothing of them, and had rather thought the travellers right in most of what they said about our politics. But, surely, neither your father nor Mr. John Effingham corroborates what they say of our society!”

“I cannot answer for either, on that point.”

“Speak then for yourself. Do you think them right?”

“You should remember, Grace, that I have not yet seen any society in New York.”

“No society, dear! Why, you were at the Hendersons’, and the Morgans’, and the Drewetts’; three of the greatest réunions that we have had in two winters!”

“I did not know that by society you meant those unpleasant crowds.”

“Unpleasant crowds! Why, child, that is society, is it not?”

“Not what I have been taught to consider such; I rather think it would be better to call it company.”

“And is not this what is called society in Paris?”

“As far from it as possible: it may be an excrescence of society, one of its forms, but by no means society itself. It would be as true to call cards, which are sometimes introduced in the world, society, as to call a ball given in too small and crowded rooms, society. They are merely two of the modes in which idlers endeavour to vary their amusements.”

“But we have little else than these balls, the morning visits, and an occasional evening, in which there is no dancing.”

“I am sorry to hear it; for in that case you can have no society.”

“And is it different in Paris, or Florence, or Rome?”

“Very. In Paris there are many houses open every evening to which one can go with little ceremony. Our sex appears in them dressed according to what a gentleman I overheard conversing at Mrs. Henderson’s would call their ‘ulterior intentions’ for the night; some attired in the simplest manner; others dressed for concerts, for the opera, for court, even; some on the way from a dinner, and others going to a late ball. All this matter-of-course variety adds to the ease and grace of the company; and, with perfect good manners, a certain knowledge of passing events, pretty modes of expression, an accurate and even utterance, the women usually find the means of making themselves agreeable. Their sentiment is sometimes a little heroic; but this one must overlook; and it is a taste, moreover, that is falling into disuse as people read better books than formerly.”

“And you prefer this heartlessness, Eve, to the nature of your own country!”

“I do not know that quiet retenue and a good tone are a whit more heartless than flirting, giggling, and childishness. There may be more nature in the latter, certainly ; but they are scarcely as agreeable after one has fairly got rid of the nursery !”

Grace looked vexed, but she loved her cousin too sincerely to be angry. A secret suspicion that Eve was right, too, came in aid of her affections ; and while her little foot moved, she maintained her good-nature,—a task not always attainable for those who believe that their own “superlatives” scarcely reach to other people’s “positives.” At this critical moment, when there was so much danger of a jar in the feelings of these two young females, the library door opened, and Pierre, Mr. Effingham’s own man, announced,—

“Monsieur Bragg.”

“Monsieur who ?” asked Eve in surprise.

“Monsieur Bragg,” returned Pierre, in French, “desires to see Mademoiselle.”

“You mean my father : I know no such person.”

“He inquired first for Monsieur ; but understanding Monsieur was out, he next asked to have the honour of seeing Mademoiselle.”

“Is it what they call a person, in England, Pierre ?”

Old Pierre smiled, as he answered—

“He has the air, Mademoiselle, though he esteems himself a personage, if I might take the liberty of judging.”

“Ask him for his card ;—there must be a mistake, I think.”

While this short conversation took place, Grace Van Courtlandt was sketching a cottage with a pen, without attending to a word that was said. But when Eve received the card from Pierre, and read aloud, with the tone of surprise that the name would be apt to excite in a novice in the art of American nomenclature, the words “Aristobulus Bragg,” her cousin began to laugh.

“Who can this possibly be, Grace ? Did you ever hear of such a person ? and what right can he have to wish to see me ?”

“Admit him, by all means ; it is your father’s land agent, and he may wish to leave some message for my uncle. You will be obliged to make his acquaintance, sooner or later, and it may as well be done now as at any other time.”

“You have shown this gentleman into the front drawing-room, Pierre ?”

“Oui, Mademoiselle.”

“I will ring when you are wanted.”

Pierre withdrew ; and Eve opened her secretary, out of which she took a small manuscript book, over the leaves of which she passed her fingers rapidly. “Here it is,” she said, smiling, “‘Mr. Aristobulus Bragg, Attorney and Counsellor at Law, and the agent of the Templeton estate.’ This precious little work, you must understand, Grace, contains sketches of the characters of such persons as I shall be the most likely to see, by John Effingham, A.M. It is a sealed volume, of course; but there can be no harm in reading the part that touches on our present visiter; and with your permission, we will have it in common.

‘Mr. Aristobulus Bragg was born in one of the western counties of Massachusetts, and emigrated to New York, after receiving his education, at the mature age of nineteen. At twenty-one he was admitted to the bar; and for the last seven years he has been a successful practitioner in all the courts of Otsego, from the justices to the circuit. His talents are undeniable, as he commenced his education at fourteen, and terminated it with éclat at twenty-one, the law course included. This man is an epitome of all that is good, and all that is bad, in a very large class of his fellow-citizens. He is quick-witted, prompt in action, enterprising in all things in which he has a real stake, and ready to turn, not only his hand, but his heart and his principles, to anything that offers an advantage. With him, literally, ‘nothing is too high to be aspired to, nothing too low to be done.’ He will run for governor, or for townclerk, just as opportunities occur; is expert in all the practices of his profession; has had a quarter’s dancing, with three years in the classics, and turned his attention towards medicine and divinity, before he finally settled down into the law. Such a compound of shrewdness, impudence, common sense, pretension, humility, cleverness, vulgarity, kind-heartedness, duplicity, selfishness, law-honesty, moral fraud, and mother-wit, mixed up with a smattering of learning and much penetration in practical things, can hardly be described, as any one of his prominent qualities is certain to be met by another quite as obvious, that is almost its converse. Mr. Bragg, in short, is purely a creature of circumstances, his qualities pointing him out for either a member of Congress, or a deputy sheriff,—offices that he is equally ready to fill. I have employed him to watch over the estate of your father, in the absence of the latter, on the principle that one practised in tricks is the best qualified to detect and expose them; and with the certainty that no man will trespass with impunity, so long as the courts continue to tax bills of costs with their present liberality.’

“You appear to know the gentleman, Grace; is this character of him faithful?”

“I know nothing of bills of costs and deputy sheriffs, but I do know that Mr. Aristobulus Bragg is an amusing mixture of strut, humility, vulgarity, roguery, and cleverness. He is waiting all this time in the drawing-room, and you had better see him, as he may now be almost considered a part of the family. You know he has been living in the house at Templeton ever since he was installed by Mr. John Effingham. It was there I had the honour first to meet him."

"First! Surely you have never seen him anywhere else?"

"Your pardon, my dear. He never comes to town without honouring me with a call. This is the price I pay for having had the honour of being an inmate of the same house with him for a week."

Eve rang the bell, and Pierre made his appearance.

"Desire Mr. Bragg to walk into the library."

Grace looked demure while Pierre was gone to usher in their visiter; and Eve was thinking of the medley of qualities John Effingham had assembled in his description, as the door opened and the subject of her contemplations entered.

"Monsieur Aristobule," said Pierre, eyeing the card intensely, but sticking at the first name.

Mr. Aristobulus Bragg was advancing with an easy assurance to make his bow to the ladies, when the more finished air and quiet dignity of Miss Effingham, who was standing, so far disconcerted him as completely to upset his self-possession. As Grace had expressed it, in consequence of having lived three years in the old residence at Templeton, he had begun to consider himself a part of the family, and at home he never spoke of the young lady without calling her "Eve," or "Eve Effingham." But he found it a very different thing to affect familiarity among his associates, and to practise it in the very face of its subject; and although seldom at a loss for words of some sort or another, he was now actually dumbfounded. Eve relieved his awkwardness by directing Pierre, with her eyes, to hand a chair, and speaking first.

"I regret that my father is not within," she said, by way of turning the visit from herself; "but he is expected every moment. Are you lately from Templeton?"

Aristobulus drew his breath, and recovered enough of his ordinary tone of manner to reply with a decent regard to his character for self-command. The intimacy that he had intended to establish on the spot was temporarily defeated, it is true, and without his exactly knowing how it had been effected; for it was merely the steadiness of the young lady, blended as it was with a polished reserve, that had thrown him to a distance he could not explain. He felt immediately, and with a tact that did his sagacity credit, that his footing in this quarter was only to be obtained by unusually slow and cautious means. Still Mr. Bragg was a man of great decision, and, in his way, of very far-sighted views; and, singular as it may seem, at that unpropitious moment, he mentally determined that, at no very distant day, he would make Miss Eve Effingham Mrs. Aristobulus Bragg.

"I hope Mr. John Effingham enjoys good health," he said, with some such caution as that with which a rebuked school-girl enters on the recitation of her task. "He enjoyed bad health, I hear," (Mr. Aristobulus Bragg, though so shrewd and observant, was far from critical in his modes of speech) "when he went to Europe; and after travelling so far in such bad company, it would be no more than fair that he should have a little respite as he approached home and old age."

Had Eve been told that the man who uttered this nice sentiment, and that, too, in accents as refined and harmonious as the thought was finished and lucid, actually presumed to think of her as his bosom companion, it is not easy to say which would have predominated in her mind, mirth or resentment. But Mr. Bragg was not in the habit of letting his secrets escape him prematurely, and certainly this was one that none but a wizard could have discovered without the aid of a direct oral, or written communication.

"Are you lately from Templeton?" repeated Eve, a little surprised that the gentleman had not seen fit to answer the question, which was the only one that, as it seemed to her, could have a common interest with them both.

"I left home the day before yesterday," Aristobulus now deigned to reply.

"It is so long since I saw our beautiful mountains, and I was then so young, that I feel great impatience to revisit them, though the pleasure must be deferred until spring."

"I conclude they are the handsomest mountains in the known world, Miss Effingham."

"That is much more than I shall venture to claim for them: but, according to my imperfect recollection, and, what I esteem of far more importance, according to the united testimony of Mr. John Effingham and my father, I think they must be very beautiful."

Aristobulus looked up as if he had a facetious thing to say, and he even ventured on a smile while he made his answer:

"I hope Mr. John Effingham has prepared you for a great change in the house?"

"We know that it has been repaired and altered under his directions. That was done at my father's request."

"We consider it denationalized, Miss Effingham, there being nothing like it west of Albany, at least."

"I should be sorry to find that my cousin has subjected us to this imputation," said Eve smiling, perhaps a little equivocally,

“the architecture of America being generally so simple and pure. Mr. Effingham laughs at his own improvements, however; in which, he says, he has only carried out the plans of the original artiste, who worked very much in what, I believe, was called the Composite order.”

“You allude to Mr. Hiram Dolittle, a gentleman I never saw; though I hear he has left behind him many traces of his progress in the new states. Ex pede Herculem, as we say in the classics, Miss Effingham. I believe it is the general sentiment that Mr. Dolittle’s designs have been improved on, though most people think that the Grecian or Roman architecture, which is so much in use in America, would be more republican. But everybody knows that Mr. John Effingham is not much of a republican.”

Eve did not choose to discuss her kinsman’s opinions with Mr. Aristobulus Bragg, and she quietly remarked that she “did not know that the imitations of the ancient architecture, of which there are so many in the country, were owing to attachment to republicanism.”

“To what else can they be owing, Miss Eve?”

“Sure enough,” said Grace Van Courtlandt, “these imitations are unsuited to the materials, the climate, and the uses; and some very powerful motive, like that mentioned by Mr. Bragg, could alone overcome all these obstacles.”

Aristobulus started from his seat, and making sundry apologies, declared his previous unconsciousness that Miss Van Courtlandt was present; all of which was true enough, as he had been so much occupied mentally with her cousin, as not to have observed her, seated as she was behind a skreen. Grace received the excuses favourably, and the conversation was resumed.

“I am sorry that my cousin should offend the taste of the country,” said Eve; “but as we are to live in the house, the punishment will fall heaviest on the offenders.”

“Do not mistake me, Miss Eve,” returned Aristobulus in a little alarm,—for he too well understood the influence and wealth of John Effingham not to wish to be on good terms with him—“do not mistake me; I admire the house, and know it to be a perfect specimen of a pure architecture in its way; but then public opinion is not yet quite up to it. I see all its beauties, I would wish you to know; but there are many,—a majority, perhaps,—who do not; and these persons think they ought to be consulted about such matters.”

“I believe Mr. John Effingham thinks less of his own work than you seem to think of it, sir; for I have frequently heard him laugh at it as a mere enlargement of the peculiar features of the Composite order. He calls it a caprice rather than a taste. Nor do

I see what concern a majority, as you term them, can have with a house that does not belong to them."

Aristobulus was surprised any one could disregard a majority, for, in this respect, he a good deal resembled Mr. Dodge, though running a somewhat different career; and the look of surprise that he gave was natural and open.

"I do not mean that the public has a legal right to control the tastes of the citizens," he said; "but in a republican government, you undoubtedly understand, Miss Eve, it will rule in all things."

"I can understand that a person might wish to see his neighbour display good taste, as it helps to embellish a country; but a man who should consult the whole neighbourhood before he built, would be very likely to erect a complicated house, if he paid much respect to the different opinions he received; or, what is quite as probable, have no house at all!"

"I think you are mistaken, Miss Effingham; for the public sentiment just now runs almost exclusively and popularly into the Grecian school. We build little besides temples for our churches, our banks, our taverns, our court-houses, and our dwellings: a friend of mine has just built a brewery on the model of the Temple of the Winds."

"Had it been a mill, one might understand the conceit," said Eve, who now began to perceive that her visiter had some latent humour, though he produced it in such a manner as to induce one to think him anything but a droll. "The mountains must be doubly beautiful if they are decorated in the way you mention. I sincerely hope, Grace, that I shall find the hills as pleasant as they now exist in my recollection!"

"Should they not prove to be quite as lovely as you imagine, Miss Effingham," returned Aristobulus, who saw no impropriety in answering a remark made to Miss Van Courtlandt, or any one else, "I hope you will have the kindness to conceal the fact from the world."

"I am afraid that would exceed my power; my disappointment would be so strong. But may I ask why you desire that I should keep so cruel a mortification to myself?"

"Why, Miss Eve," said Aristobulus, looking grave, "I am afraid that our people would hardly bear the expression of such an opinion from you."

"From me!—And why not from me in particular?"

"Perhaps it is because they think you have travelled, and have seen other countries."

"And is it only those who have not travelled, and who have no means of knowing the value of what they see, that are privileged to criticise?"

"I cannot exactly explain my own meaning, perhaps ; but I think Miss Grace will understand me. Do you not agree with me, Miss Van Courtlandt, in thinking it would be safer for one who never saw any other mountains to complain of the tameness and monotony of our own, than for one who had passed a whole life among the Andes and the Alps?"

Eve smiled, for she saw that Mr. Bragg was capable of detecting and laughing at provincial feeling, even while he was so much under its influence ; and Grace coloured, for she had the consciousness of having already betrayed some of this very silly sensitiveness in her intercourse with her cousin in connection with other subjects. A reply was unnecessary, however, as the door just then opened, and John Effingham made his appearance. The meeting between the two gentlemen,—for we suppose that Aristobulus must be included in this category, by courtesy, if not of right,—was more cordial than Eve had expected, for each really entertained a respect for the other, in reference to a merit of a particular sort ; Mr. Bragg esteeming Mr. John Effingham as a wealthy and caustic cynic ; and Mr. John Effingham regarding Mr. Bragg much as the owner of a dwelling regards a valuable house-dog. After a few moments of conversation, the two withdrew together ; and just as the ladies were about to descend to the drawing-room previously to dining, Pierre announced to them that a plate had been ordered for the land-agent.

CHAPTER II.

"I know that Deformed ; he has been a vile thief this seven year ; he goes up and down like a gentleman."

Much Ado About Nothing.

Eve and her cousin found Sir George Templemore and Captain Truck in the drawing-room, the former having lingered in New York with a desire to be near his friends, and the latter being on the point of sailing for Europe in his regular turn. To these must be added Mr. Bragg, and the ordinary inmates of the house, when the reader will have a view of the whole party.

Aristobulus had never before sat down to so brilliant a table, and for the first time in his life he saw candles lighted at dinner ; but he was not a man to be disconcerted at a novelty. Had he been a European of the same origin and habits, he would have been betrayed by awkwardness fifty times before the dessert made its appearance ; but being the man he was, an observer, overlooking a certain prurient politeness that rather illustrated his deportment, might very well have permitted him to pass among the nameless crowd of the world, had it not been for a certain remarkable management in his way of providing for himself at the table. It is true, that he invited those near him to eat of everything he could reach, but he used his knife as a coalheaver uses a shovel; the company he was in, however, though fastidious in its own deportment, was altogether above silver forkisms; and this portion of his demeanour, if it did not escape undetected, passed away unnoticed. Not so, however, the peculiarity already alluded to, which, being characteristic of the man, deserves to be mentioned a little more in detail.

The dinner at Mr. Effingham's table was served in the quiet and complete manner that distinguishes a French dinner. Every dish was removed, carved by the domestics, and handed in turn to each guest. But the delay and dignity of this arrangement suited neither Aristobulus's go-ahead-ism, nor his organs of acquisitiveness. Instead of waiting, therefore, for the more graduated movements of the domestics, he began to take care of himself, an office that he performed with a certain dexterity acquired by frequenting ordinaries,—a school, by the way, in which he had obtained most of his notions of the proprieties of the table. One or two slices were obtained in the usual manner, by means of the regular service; and then, like one who had laid the foundations of a fortune by some lucky windfall in the commencement of his career, he began to make accessions, right and left, as opportunity offered. Sundry entremets, or light dishes, that had a peculiarly tempting appearance, came first under his grasp: all these he soon accumulated within his reach, by means of taxing his neighbours; after which he ventured to send his plate, here and there, wherever he saw a dish that promised to reward his trouble. By such means,—which were resorted to, however, with a quiet and unobtrusive assiduity that escaped much observation,—Mr. Bragg contrived to make his own plate an epitome of the first course. It contained in the centre, fish, beef, and ham, and around these staple articles he had arranged croquettes, rognons, ragouts, vegetables, and other light things, until not only was the plate completely covered, but it was actually covered in double and triple layers; mustard, cold butter, salt, and even pepper, garnishing its edges. These different accumulations were the work of time and address, and most of the company had repeatedly changed their plates before Aristobulus had eaten a mouthful, the soup excepted. The happy moment when his ingenuity was to be rewarded had now arrived, and the land agent was about to commence the process of mastication, or of deglutition rather, for he troubled himself very little with the first operation, when the report of a cork drew his attention towards the champagne. To Aristobulus this wine never came amiss, for, relishing its piquancy, he had never gone far enough into the science of the table to learn which were the proper moments for using it. As respected the rest of the company, this moment had in truth arrived; though, as respected himself, he was no nearer to it, according to a regulated taste, than when he first took his seat. Perceiving that Pierre was serving it, however, he presented his glass, and enjoyed a delicious instant as he swallowed a beverage that much surpassed anything that he had ever known to issue out of the waxed and leaded nozzles, that garnished sundry village bars of his acquaintance, pointed like so many enemies' batteries, loaded with headaches and disordered stomachs.

Aristobulus finished his glass at a draught, and when he took breath he fairly smacked his lips. That was an unlucky instant, his plate, burthened with all its treasures, being removed at this unguarded moment; the man who performed the unkind office fancying that a dislike to the dishes could alone have given rise to an omnium gatherum which he had never before witnessed.

It was necessary to commence de novo; but this could no longer be done with the first course, which had been removed, and Aristobulus set to with zeal forthwith on the game. Necessity now compelled him to eat as the different dishes were offered; and exercising his ordinary assiduity with his knife and fork, at the end of the second remove, he had actually disposed of more food than any other person at table. He now began to converse, and we shall open the conversation at the precise point in the dinner when it was in the power of Aristobulus to become one of the interlocutors.

Unlike Mr. Dodge, he had betrayed no peculiar interest in a baronet, being a man too shrewd and worldly to set his heart on trifles of any sort, and Mr. Bragg no more hesitated about replying to Sir George Templemore or Mr. Effingham, than he would have hesitated about replying to one of his nearest associates. With him age and experience formed no particular claims to be heard; and, as to rank, it is true he had some vague ideas about such a thing in the militia, but to unsalaried rank he attached no great importance. Sir George Templemore was inquiring concerning the recording of deeds, — a regulation that had recently attracted attention in England, — and one of Mr. Effingham's replies contained some immaterial inaccuracy which Aristobulus took occasion to correct, as his coup d'essai in the general discourse.

“I ask pardon, sir,” he concluded his explanations by saying, “but I ought to know these little niceties, having served a short part of a term as a county clerk, to fill a vacancy occasioned by death."

"You mean, Mr. Bragg, that you were employed to write in a county clerk's office," observed John Effingham, who so much disliked untruth that he did not hesitate to rebuke what was untrue, or what he fancied to be so, without much ceremony.

"As county clerk, sir. Major Pippin died a year before his time was out, and I got the appointment.—As regular a county clerk, sir, as there is in the fifty-six counties of New York."

"When I had the honour to engage you as Mr. Effingham's agent, sir," returned the other a little sternly,—for he felt his own character for veracity involved in that of the subject of his selection,—“I believe, indeed, that you were writing in the office, but I did not understand you were he clerk."

"Very true, Mr. John," returned Aristobulus, without discovering the least concern; "I was then engaged by my successor as a clerk; but a few months earlier I filled the office of county clerk."

"Had you gone on in the regular line of promotion, my dear sir, to what preferment would you have risen by this time?" pithily inquired Captain Truck.

"I believe I understand you, gentlemen," returned the unmoved Aristobulus, who perceived a general smile. "I know that some people are particular about keeping pretty much on the same level as to office; but I hold to no such doctrine. If one good thing cannot be had, I do not see that it is a reason for rejecting another. I ran that year for sheriff, and finding I was not strong enough to carry the county, I accepted my successor's offer to write in the office until something better might turn up."

"You practised all this time, I believe, Mr. Bragg," observed John Effingham.

"I did a little in that way, too, sir; or as much as I could. Law is flat with us of late, and many of the attorneys are turning their attention to other callings."

"And pray, sir," asked Sir George, "what is the favourite pursuit of most of them just now?"

"Some our way have gone into the horse line; but much the greater portion are just now dealing in western cities."

"In western cities!" exclaimed the baronet, looking as if he suspected a mystification.

"In such articles, and in mill-seats, and railroad lines, and other expectations."

"Mr. Bragg means that they are buying and selling lands on which it is hoped all these conveniencies may exist a century hence," explained John Effingham.

“The hope is for next year, or next week, even, Mr. John,” returned Aristobulus with a sly look; “though you may be very right as to the reality. Great fortunes have been made on a capital of hopes lately, in this country.”

“And you have been able yourself to resist these temptations?” asked Mr. Effingham: “I feel doubly indebted to you, sir, that you should have continued to devote your time to my interests, while so many better things presented themselves.”

“It was my duty, sir,”—bowing so much the lower from the consciousness that he had actually deserted his post for some months to embark in the western speculations which then were so active in the country, “not to say my pleasure. There are many profitable occupations in this country, Sir George, that have been overlooked in the eagerness to embark in the town trade.”

“Town trade!”

“Mr. Bragg does not mean trade in town, but trade in towns,” explained John Effingham.

“Yes, sir, the traffic in cities. I never come this way without casting an eye about me, in order to see if there is anything to be done that is useful, and I confess that several available opportunities have offered, if one had capital. Milk is a good business.”

“Le lait!” exclaimed Mademoiselle Vieffville involuntarily.

“Yes, ma’am, for ladies as well as gentlemen. Sweet potatoes I have heard well spoken of; and peaches are really making some rich men’s fortunes.”

“All of which are honester and better occupations than the traffic in cities that you have mentioned,” quietly observed Mr. Effingham.

Aristobulus looked up in a little surprise, for with him everything was eligible that returned a good profit, and all things honest that the laws did not actually prohibit. Perceiving, however, that the company was disposed to listen, and having by this time recovered his lost ground in the way of food, he cheerfully resumed his theme.

“Many families have left Otsego this and the last summer, Mr. Effingham, as emigrants for the west. The fever has spread far and wide.”

“The fever! Is old Otsego,”—for so its inhabitants love to call a county of half a century’s existence, which is venerable by comparison,—“is old Otsego losing its well-established character for salubrity?”

“I do not allude to an animal fever, but to the western fever.”

“Ce pays de l'Ouest est-il bien malsain?” whispered Mademoiselle Vieffville.

“Apparemment, mademoiselle, sur plusieurs rapports.”

“The western fever has seized old and young; and it has carried off many entire families from our part of the world,” continued Aristobulus, who did not understand the little aside just mentioned, and who, of course, did not heed it; “most of the counties adjoining our own have lost a considerable portion of their population also.”

“And they who have gone; do they belong to the permanent families, or are they merely the floating inhabitants?” inquired Mr. Effingham.

“Most of them belong to the regular movers.”

“Movers!” again exclaimed Sir George; “is there any material part of your population who actually deserve this name?”

“As much so as the man who shoes a horse ought to be called a smith, or the man who frames a house a carpenter,” answered John Effingham.

“To be sure,” continued Mr. Bragg, “we have a pretty considerable leaven of them in our political dough, as well as in our active business. I believe, Sir George, that in England men are tolerably stationary.”

“We love to continue for generations on the same spot. We love the tree that our forefathers planted, the roof that they built, the fire-side by which they sat, the sods that cover their remains.”

“Very poetical; and I dare say there are situations in life in which such feelings come in without much effort. It must be a great check to business operations, however, in your part of the world, sir.”

“Business operations! What is business, as you term it, sir, to the affections, to the feelings of ancestry, and to the solemn ties connected with history and traditions?”

“Why, sir, in the way of history one meets with but few incumbrances in this country; but one may do very much as interest dictates, so far as that is concerned, at least. A nation is much to be pitied that is weighed down by the past in this manner, since its industry and enterprise are constantly impeded by obstacles that grow out of its recollections. America may, indeed, be termed a happy and a free country, Mr. John Effingham, in this as well as in all other things.”

Sir George Templemore was too well bred to utter all that he felt at that moment, as it would unavoidably have wounded the feelings of his hosts; but he was rewarded for his forbearance by intelligent smiles from Eve and Grace; the latter of whom the young baronet fancied, just at that moment, was quite as beautiful as her cousin, and if less finished in manners, had the most interesting naïveté.

“I have been told that most old nations have to struggle with difficulties that we escape,” returned John Effingham; “though I confess this is a superiority on our part that never before presented itself to my mind.”

“The political economist,” observed Mr. Bragg, “and even the geographers, have overlooked it; but practical men see and feel its advantages every hour in the day. I have been told, Sir George Templemore, that in England there are difficulties in running high ways and streets through homesteads and dwellings, and that even a rail-road, or a canal, is obliged to make a curve to avoid a churchyard, or a tombstone?”

“I confess the sin, sir.”

“Our friend Mr. Bragg,” interposed John Effingham, “considers life as all means and no end.”

“An end cannot be got at without the means, Mr. John Effingham, as I trust you will yourself admit. I am for the end of the road, at least, and must say that I rejoice in being a native of a country in which as few impediments as possible exist to onward impulses. The man who should resist an improvement, in our part of the country, on account of his forefathers, would fare badly among his contemporaries.”

“Will you permit me to ask, Mr. Bragg, if you feel no local attachment yourself?” inquired the baronet, throwing as much delicacy into the tones of his voice as a question that he felt ought to be an insult to a man’s heart would allow; — “if one tree is not more pleasant than another; the house you were born in more beautiful in your eyes than a house into which you never entered; or the altar at which you have long worshipped, more sacred than another at which you never knelt?”

“Nothing gives me greater satisfaction than to answer the questions of gentlemen that travel through our country,” returned Aristobulus; “for I think that in making nations acquainted with each other, we encourage trade, and render business more secure. To reply to your inquiry, then, a human being is not a cat, to love a locality rather than its own interests; I have found some trees much pleasanter than others, I allow, and the pleasantest tree I can remember was one of my own, out of which the sawyer made a thousand feet of clear stuff, to say nothing of middlings. The house I was born in was pulled down shortly after my birth, as, indeed, has been its successor, so I can tell you nothing on that head; and, as for altars, there are none in my persuasion.”

“The church of Mr. Bragg has stripped itself as naked as he would strip everything else, if he could," said John Effingham. "I much question if he ever knelt, even; much less before an altar."

"We are of the standing order, certainly," returned Aristobulus, glancing towards the ladies to discover how they took his wit; "and Mr. John Effingham is as near right as a man need be in a matter of faith. In the way of houses, Mr. Effingham, I believe it is the general opinion you might have done better with your own than to have repaired it. Had the materials been disposed of, they would have sold well; and by running a street through the property, a pretty sum might have been realized."

"In which case I should have been without a house, Mr. Bragg."

"It would have been no great matter if you had got another on cheaper land. The old residence would even have made a good factory, or an inn."

"Sir, I am a cat, and like the places I have long frequented."

Aristobulus, though not easily daunted, was awed by Mr. Effingham's manner, and Eve saw that her father's fine face had flushed with feeling. This interruption, therefore, changed the discourse, which has been related at some length, as likely to give the reader a better insight into a character that will fill some space in our narrative, than a more laboured description.

"I trust your owners, Captain Truck," said John Effingham, by way of turning the conversation into another channel, "are fully satisfied with the manner in which you saved their property from the hands of the Arabs?"

"Men, when money is concerned, are more disposed to remember how it was lost than how it was recovered, religion and trade being the two poles on such a point," returned the old seaman with a serious face. "On the whole, my dear sir, I have reason to be satisfied, however; and so long as you, my passengers and my friends, are not inclined to blame me, I shall feel as if I had done, at least, a part of my duty."

Eve rose from the table, went to a sideboard, and returned, when she gracefully placed before the master of the Montauk a rich and beautifully chased punch-bowl in silver. Almost at the same moment Pierre offered a salver that contained a capital watch, a pair of small silver tongs to hold a coal, and a deck-trumpet, in solid silver.

"These are so many faint testimonies of our feelings," said Eve; "and you will do us the favour to retain them as evidences of the esteem created by your skill, kindness, and courage."

"My dear young lady!" cried the old tar, touched to the soul by the feeling with which Eve acquitted herself of this little duty,—"my dear young lady!—well, God bless you!—God bless you all!—and you, too, Mr. John Effingham, for that matter!—and Sir George—That I should ever have taken that run-away for a gentleman and a baronet! — though I suppose there are some silly baronets as well as silly lords who retain such!” glancing furiously at Mr. Aristobulus Bragg. “May the Lord forget me in the heaviest hurricane, if I ever forget whence these things came, and why they were given!”

Here the worthy captain was obliged to swallow some wine by way of relieving his emotion; and Aristobulus, profiting by the opportunity, coolly took the bowl which, to use a word of his own, he hefted in his hand, with a view to form some tolerably accurate notion of its intrinsic value. Captain Truck’s eye caught the action, and he reclaimed his property quite as unceremoniously as it had been taken away, nothing but the presence of the ladies preventing an outbreking that would have amounted to a declaration of war.

“With your permission, sir,” said the captain drily, after he had recovered the bowl, not only without the other’s consent, but, in some degree, against his will. “This bowl is as precious in my eyes as if it were made of my father’s bones.”

“You may, indeed, think so,” returned the land-agent, “for its cost would not be less than one hundred dollars.”

“Cost, sir! — But, my dear young lady, let us talk of the real value. For what part of these things am I indebted to you?”

“The bowl is my offering,” Eve answered smilingly, though a tear glistened in her eye as she witnessed the strong unsophisticated feeling of the old tar. “I thought it might serve sometimes to bring me to your recollection when it was well filled in honour of ‘sweethearts and wives.’”

“It shall—it shall, by the Lord! and Mr. Saunders needs look to it if he do not keep this work as bright as a cruising frigate’s bottom. To whom do I owe the coal-tongs?”

“They come from Mr. John Effingham, who insists that he will get nearer to your heart than any of us, though the gift be of so little cost.”

“He does not know me, my dear young lady: nobody ever got so near my heart as you; no, not even my own dear pious old mother. But I thank Mr. John Effingham from my inmost spirit, and shall seldom smoke without thinking of him. The watch I know is Mr. Effingham’s, and I ascribe the trumpet to Sir George.”

The bows of the several gentlemen assured the captain he was right, and he shook each of them cordially by the hand, protesting in the fulness of his heart, that nothing would give him greater pleasure than to be able to go through again in their good company the same perilous scenes as those from which they had so lately escaped.

While this was going on, Aristobulus, notwithstanding the rebuke he had received, contrived to get each article in succession into his hands, and by dint of poising it on a finger, and by examining it, to form some approximative notion of its inherent value. The watch he actually opened, taking as good a survey of its works as the circumstances of the case would very well allow.

"I respect these things, sir, more than you respect your father's grave," said Captain Truck sternly, as he rescued the last article from what he thought the impious grasp of Aristobulus; "and cat or no cat, they sink or swim with me for the remainder of the cruise. If there is any virtue in a will, which I am sorry to say I hear there is not any longer, they shall share my last bed with me, be it ashore or be it afloat. My dear young lady! fancy all the rest; but, depend on it, punch will be sweeter than ever taken from this vessel, and 'sweethearts and wives' will never be so honoured again."

"We are going to a ball this evening, at the house of one with whom I am sufficiently intimate to take the liberty of introducing a stranger; and I wish, gentlemen," said Mr. Effingham, bowing to Aristobulus and the captain, by way of changing the conversation, "you would do me the favour to be of our party."

Mr. Bragg acquiesced very cheerfully, and as a matter of course; while Captain Truck, after protesting his unfitness for such scenes, was finally prevailed on by John Effingham to comply with the request also. The ladies remained only a few minutes longer at table, but Mr. Effingham followed the old custom of sitting at the bottle until summoned to the drawing-room,—a usage that continues to exist in America for a reason no better than the fact that it continues to exist in England, it being almost certain that it will cease in New York the season after it is known to have ceased in London.

CHAPTER III.

"Thou art as wise as thou art beautiful."

SHAKESPEARE.

As Captain Truck asked permission to initiate the new coal-tongs by lighting a cigar, Sir George Templemore contrived to ask Pierre, aside, if the ladies would allow him to join them. The decided consent having been obtained, the baronet quietly stole from table, and was soon beyond the odours of the dining-room.

“You miss the censer, and the frankincense,” said Eve, laughing, as Sir George entered the drawing-room; “but you will remember we have no church establishment, and dare not take such liberties with the ceremonials of the altar.”

“That is a short-lived custom with us, I fancy, though far from an unpleasant one. You do me injustice, however, in supposing I am merely running away from the fumes of the dinner.”

“No, no; we understand perfectly well that you have also something to do with the fumes of flattery, and we will at once fancy all has been said that the occasion requires. Is not our honest old captain a jewel, in his way?”

“Upon my word, since you allow me to speak of your father’s guests, I do not think it possible to have brought together two men who are so completely the opposites of each other, as Captain Truck and this Mr. Aristobulus Bragg. The latter is the most extraordinary person it ever was my good fortune to meet.”

“You call him a person—Pierre calls him a personage; I fancy he considers it very much a matter of accident, whether he is to pass his days in the one character, or in the other. Cousin Jack assures me, that, while this man accepts almost any duty that he chooses to assign him, he would not deem it at all a violation of the convenances to aim at the throne in the White House.”

“I cannot answer for that. The man must undergo many essential changes, and much radical improvement, before such a climax to his fortunes can ever occur; but the instant you do away with the claims of hereditary power, the door is opened to a new chapter of accidents. Alexander of Russia styled himself un heureux accident, and should it ever be our fortune to receive Mr. Bragg as President, we shall only have to term him un malheureux accident. I believe that will contain all the difference.”

“Your republicanism is indomitable, Miss Effingham, and I shall abandon the attempt to convert you to safer principles, more especially as I find you supported by both the Mr. Effinghams, who, while they condemn so much at home, seem singularly attached to their own system at the bottom.

“They condemn, Sir George Templemore, because, though they know perfection to be hopeless, they feel it to be unsafe and unwise to eulogize defects; and they are attached, because near views of other countries have convinced them that, comparatively at least, bad as we confessedly are, we are still better than most of our neighbours.”

"I can assure you," said Grace, "that many of the opinions of Mr. John Effingham, in particular, are not at all the opinions that are most in vogue here; he rather censures what we like, and likes what we censure. Even my dear uncle is thought to be a little heterodox on such subjects."

"I can readily believe it," returned Eve, steadily. "These gentlemen having become familiar with better things in the way of taste, and of the purely agreeable, cannot discredit their own knowledge so much as to extol that which their own experience tells them is relatively good. Now, Grace, if you will reflect a moment, you will perceive, that people necessarily like the best of their own tastes, until they come to a knowledge of better; and that they as necessarily quarrel with the unpleasant facts that surround them; although these facts, as consequences of a political system, may be much less painful than those of other systems of which they have no knowledge. In the one case, they like their own best, simply because it is their own best; and they dislike their own worst, because it is their own worst. We cherish a taste, in the nature of things, without entering into any comparisons; for when the means of comparison offer, and we find improvements, it ceases to be a taste at all; while to complain of any positive grievance is in the nature of man, I fear."

"I think a republic odious!"

"La république est une horreur!"

Grace thought a republic odious, without knowing anything of any other state of society, and because it contained odious things, and Mademoiselle Vieffville called a republic une horreur, because heads fell and anarchy prevailed in her own country during its early struggles for liberty. Though Eve seldom spoke more sensibly, and never more temperately, than while delivering the foregoing opinions, Sir George Templemore doubted whether she had all that exquisite finesse and delicacy of features that he had so much admired, and when Grace burst out in the sudden and senseless exclamation we have recorded, he turned towards her sweet and animated countenance, which, for the moment at least, he fancied the loveliest of the two.

Eve Effingham had yet to learn that she had just entered into the most intolerant society, meaning purely as society, and in connexion with what are usually called liberal sentiments in Christendom. We do not mean by this, that it would be less safe to utter a generous opinion in favour of human rights in America than in any other country, for the laws and the institutions become active in this respect; but, simply, that the resistance of the more refined to the encroachments of the unrefined, has brought about a state of feeling—a feeling that is seldom just and never philosophical—which has created a silent but almost unanimous bias against the effects of the institutions, in what is called the world. In Europe, one rarely utters a sentiment of this nature, under circumstances in which it is safe to do so at all, without finding a very general sympathy in the auditors; but in the circle into which Eve had now fallen, it was almost considered a violation of the proprieties to intimate that the mass of men have rights. We do not wish to be understood as saying more than we mean, however; for we have no manner of doubt that a large portion of the dissentients even, are so, idly and without reflection, or for the very natural reason given by our heroine; but we do wish to be understood as meaning that such is the outward appearance which American society presents to every stranger, and to every native of the country too, on his return from a residence among other people. Of its taste, wisdom, and safety we shall not now speak, but content ourselves with merely saying, that the effect of Grace's exclamation on Eve was unpleasant, and that, unlike the baronet, she thought her cousin was never less handsome than while her pretty face was covered with the pettish frown it had assumed for the occasion.

Sir George Templemore had tact enough to perceive there had been a slight jar in the feelings of these two young women, and he adroitly changed the conversation. With Eve he had entire confidence on the score of provincialisms, and without exactly remembering the part Grace would be likely to take in such a discussion, he introduced the subject of general society in New York, a little maladroitement, perhaps.

"I am anxious to know," he said, "if you have your sets as we have them in London and Paris? Whether you have your faubourg St.-Germain and your Chaussée d'Antin; your Piccadilly, Grosvenor, and Russell Squares?"

"I must refer you to Miss Van Courtlandt for an answer to that question," said Eve.

Grace looked up blushing, for it was a novel and exciting circumstance to be questioned by an intelligent foreigner on such a subject.

"I do not know that I rightly understand the allusions," she said; "although I am afraid Sir George Templemore means to ask if we have distinctions in society?"

"And why afraid, Miss Van Courtlandt?"

"Because it strikes me such a question would imply a doubt of our civilization."

"There are frequently more distinctions than obvious differences," observed Eve. "Even London and Paris are not above the imputation of this folly. Sir George Templemore, if I understand him, wishes to know if we estimate gentility by streets, and quality by squares."

"Not exactly that either, Miss Effingham; but whether, among those, who may very well pass for gentlemen and ladies, you enter into the minute distinctions that are elsewhere found. Whether you have your 'exclusives,' and your élégants and élégantes, or whether you deem all within the pale as on an equality?"

"Les femmes américaines sont bien jolies!" exclaimed Mademoiselle Vieffville.

"It is impossible that coteries should not be formed in a town of three hundred thousand souls."

"I do not mean even that. Is there no distinction between coteries? is not one placed above another by opinion, by silent consent, if not by positive ordinances?"

"Certainly, the distinction to which Sir George Templemore alludes, is to be met with," said Grace, who gained courage to speak as she found the subject getting more clearly within her comprehension. "All the old families, for instance, keep more together than others; though it is the subject of regret that they are not much more particular than they are."

"Old families!" exclaimed Sir George Templemore, with quite as much stress as a well-bred man could very well lay on the words in such circumstances.

"Old families," repeated Eve, with all that emphasis which the baronet himself had hesitated about giving;—"as old, at least, as two centuries can make them; and this, too, with origins beyond that period, like those of the rest of the world. Indeed, the American has a better gentility than common, as, besides his own, he may take root in that of Europe."

"Do not misconceive me, Miss Effingham; I am fully aware that the people of this country are exactly like the people of all other civilized countries in this respect; but my surprise is, that, in a republic, you should have such a term even as that of 'old families.'"

"The surprise has arisen then, I must be permitted to say, from not having sufficiently reflected on the real state of the country. There are two great causes of distinction every where, wealth and merit. Now, if a race of Americans continue conspicuous in their own society, through either or both of these causes, for a succession of generations, why have they not the same claims to be considered members of old families, as well as Europeans, under precisely the same circumstances? A republican history is as much a history as a monarchical history, and a historical name in one is quite as much entitled to consideration as a historical name in the other. Nay, you admit this in your European republics, while you wish to deny it in ours."

"I must insist in having proofs: if we permit these charges to be brought against us without evidence, Mademoiselle Viefville, we shall finally be defeated through our own neglect."

"C'est une belle illustration, celle de l'antiquité!" observed the governess, in a matter-of-course tone.

"If you insist on proof, what answer can you urge to the 'Capponi — sonnez vos trompettes, et je vais faire sonner mes cloches,' or to the von Erlachs, a family that has headed so many resistances to oppression and invasion for five centuries?"

"All this is very true," returned Sir George, "and yet I confess it is not the way in which it is usual with us to consider American society."

"A descent from Washington, with a character and a social position to correspond, would not be absolutely vulgar, notwithstanding."

"Nay, if you press me so hard, I must appeal to Miss Van Courtlandt for succour."

"On this point you will find no support in that quarter. Miss Van Courtlandt has an historical name herself, and will not forego an honest pride, in order to relieve one of the hostile powers from a dilemma."

"While I admit that time and merit must, in a certain sense, place families in America in the same situation as families in Europe, I cannot see that it is in conformity with your institutions to lay the same stress on the circumstances."

"In that we are perfectly of one mind; for I think the American has much the best reason to be proud of his family," said Eve, quietly.

"You delight in paradoxes, apparently, this evening, Miss Effingham, for now I feel very certain you can hardly make out a plausible defence of this new position."

"If I had my old ally, Mr. Powis, here," said Eve, touching the fender unconsciously with her little foot, and perceptibly losing the animation and pleasantry of her voice in tones that were gentler if not melancholy, "I should ask him to explain this matter to you, for he was singularly ready in such replies. As he is absent, however, I will attempt the duty myself. In Europe, office, power, and consequently consideration, are all hereditary; whereas in this country they are not, but depend on selection. Now, surely, one has more reason to be proud of ancestors who have been chosen to fill responsible stations, than of ancestors who have filled them solely through the accidents, heureux ou malheureux, of birth. The only difference between England and America, as respects family, is, that you add positive rank to that to which we only give consideration. Sentiment is at the bottom of our nobility, and the Great Seal at the bottom of yours. And, now, having established the fact that there are families in America, let us return whence we started, and inquire how far they have an influence in every-day society."

"To ascertain this we must apply to Miss Van Courtlandt."

"Much less than they ought, if my opinion is to be taken," said Grace, warmly, "for the great inroad of strangers has completely deranged all the suitablenesses in that respect."

"And yet, I dare say, these very strangers do good," rejoined Eve. "Many of them must have been respectable in their native places, and ought to be an acquisition to a society which in its nature must be tant soit peu provincial."

"Oh!" cried Grace, "I can tolerate anything but the Hajjis!"

"The what?" asked Sir George, eagerly: "will you suffer me to ask an explanation, Miss Van Courtlandt?"

"The Hajjis," repeated Grace laughing, though she blushed to the eyes.

The baronet looked from one cousin to the other, and then turned an inquiring glance on Mademoiselle Vieffville. The latter gave a slight shrug, and seemed to ask an explanation of the young lady's meaning, herself.

"A Hajji is one of a class, Sir George Templemore," Eve at length said, "to which you and I have both the honour of belonging."

"No, not Sir George Templemore," interrupted Grace, with a precipitation that she instantly regretted; "he is not an American."

"Then I alone, of all present, have that advantage. It means the pilgrimage to Paris, instead of Mecca; and the pilgrim must be an American instead of a Mohammedan."

"Nay, Eve, you are not a Hajji, neither."

"Then there is some qualification with which I am not yet acquainted: will you relieve our doubts, Grace, and let us know the precise character of the animal."

"You stayed too long to be a Hajji — one must get inoculated merely, not take the disease and become cured, to be a true Hajji."

"I thank you, Miss Van Courtlandt, for this description," returned Eve, in her quiet way. "I hope, as I have gone through the malady, it has not left me pitted."

"I should like to see one of these Hajjis!" cried Sir George. "Are they of both sexes?"

Grace laughed, and nodded her head.

“Will you point out a Hajji to me, should we be so fortunate as to encounter one this evening?”

Again Grace laughed, and nodded her head.

“I have been thinking, Grace,” said Eve after a short pause, “that we may give Sir George Templemore a better idea of the sets about which he is so curious, by doing what is no more than a duty on our part, and letting him profit by the opportunity. Mr. Hawker receives this evening without ceremony; we have not yet sent our answers to Mrs. Jarvis, and might very well look in upon her for half an hour, after which we shall be in very good season for Mrs. Houston’s ball.”

“Surely you would not wish, Eve, to take Sir George Templemore to such a house as that of Mrs. Jarvis!”

“I do not wish to take Sir George Templemore anywhere, for your Hajjis have opinions of their own on such subjects; but, as cousin Jack will accompany us, he may very well confer that important favour. I dare say Mrs. Jarvis will not look upon his doing so as too great a liberty.”

“I will answer for it, that nothing Mr. John Effingham can do, will be thought mal à propos by Mrs. Jared Jarvis. His position in society is too well established, and hers is too equivocal, to leave any doubt on that head.”

“This, you perceive, settles the point of coteries,” said Eve to the baronet. “Volumes might be written to establish principles; but when persons can do anything they please, wherever they like, it may be safely said that they are privileged.”

“All very true, as to the fact, Miss Effingham; but I should like exceedingly to know the reason.”

“Such things are very frequently decided without a reason at all. You are a little exacting to require a reason in New York, for that which is done in London without the pretence of such a thing. It is sufficient that Mrs. Jarvis will be delighted to see you without an invitation, and that Mrs. Houston would, at least, think it odd were you to take the same liberty with her.”

“It follows,” said Sir George, smiling, “that Mrs. Jarvis is much the more hospitable person of the two.”

“And, Eve, what shall be done with Captain Truck and Mr. Bragg?” asked Grace — “we cannot take them to Mrs. Hawker’s.”

“Aristobulus would, indeed, be a little out of place in such a house, but as for the excellent, brave, straight-forward old captain, he is worthy to go anywhere. I shall be delighted to present him to Mrs. Hawker myself.”

After a little consultation between the ladies, it was settled that nothing should be said of the first two visits to Mr. Bragg, but that Mr. Effingham should be requested to bring him to the ball, at the proper hour, and that the rest of the party should go quietly off to the other places without mentioning their project. As soon as this was arranged the ladies retired to dress, Sir George Templemore passing into the library to amuse himself with a book the while; where, however, he was soon joined by John Effingham. Here the former revived the conversation on distinctions in society, with the confusion of thought that usually distinguishes a European notion on such matters, as they are connected with America.

CHAPTER IV.

"Ready."

"And I."

"And I."

"Where shall we go?"

Midsummer Night's Dream.

Grace Van Courtlandt was the first to make her appearance after the retreat from the drawing-room. It has often been said that, pretty as the American females incontestably are, they appear better, upon the whole, in demi-toilette than when attired for a ball. With what would be termed full-dress in other parts of the world, they are little acquainted; but reversing the rule of Europe, where the married bestow the most care on their personal appearance, and the single are taught to observe a rigid simplicity, Grace now seemed sufficiently ornamented in the eyes of the fastidious baronet, while, at the same time, he thought her less obnoxious to the criticism just mentioned than most of her young countrywomen in general.

An embonpoint that was just sufficient to distinguish her from most of her companions, a fine colour, brilliant eyes, a sweet smile, rich hair, and such feet and hands as Sir George Templemore had, somehow—he scarcely knew how, himself—fancied could only belong to the daughters of peers and princes, rendered Grace so strikingly attractive this evening, that the young baronet began to think her even handsomer than her cousin. There was also a charm in the unsophisticated simplicity of Grace, that was particularly alluring to a man educated amidst the coldness and mannerism of the higher classes of England. In Grace, too, this simplicity was chastened by perfect decorum and retenue of deportment, the exuberance of the new school of manners not having helped to impair the dignity of her character, or to weaken the charm of diffidence. She was, certainly, less finished in her breeding than Eve; a circumstance, perhaps, that induced Sir George Templemore to fancy her slightly more simple; but she was never unfeminine or unlady-like; and the term vulgar, in despite of all the capricious and arbitrary rules of fashion, could never, under any circumstances, be applied to Grace Van Courtlandt. In this respect, nature seemed to have aided her; for had not her associations raised her above such an imputation, no one could believe that she would have been obnoxious to the charge, had her lot in life been cast even many degrees lower than it actually was.

It is well known that, after a sufficient similarity has been created by education to prevent any violent shocks to our habits or principles, we most affect those whose characters and dispositions the least resemble our own. This was probably one of the reasons why Sir George Templemore, who for some time had been well assured of the hopelessness of his suit with Eve, began to regard her scarcely less lovely cousin with an interest of a novel and lively nature. Quick-sighted and deeply interested in Grace's happiness, Miss Effingham had already detected this change in the young baronet's inclinations, and though sincerely rejoiced on her own account, she did not observe it without concern; for she understood better than most of her countrywomen how greatly the peace of mind of an American woman is endangered by transplanting her into the more artificial circles of the Old World.

"I shall rely on your kind offices in particular, Miss Van Courtlandt, to reconcile Mrs. Jarvis and Mrs. Hawker to the liberty I am about to take," cried Sir George, as Grace burst on them in the library in a blaze of beauty, that, in her case, was aided by her attire; "and cold-hearted and unchristian-like women they must be, indeed, to resist such a mediator."

Grace was unaccustomed to adulation of this sort, for though the baronet spoke gaily, and like one half trifling, his look of admiration was too honest to escape the instinctive perception of woman. She blushed deeply, and then recovering herself instantly said with a naïveté that had a thousand charms with her listener,—

"I do not see why Miss Effingham and myself should hesitate about introducing you at either place. Mrs. Hawker is a relative and an intimate—an intimate of mine at least—and as for poor Mrs. Jarvis, she is the daughter of an old neighbour, and will be too glad to see us to raise objections. I fancy any one of a certain—." Grace hesitated and laughed.

"Any one of a certain—?" said Sir George, inquiringly.

"Any one from this house," resumed the young lady, correcting the intended expression, "will be welcome in Spring Street."

"Pure, native, aristocracy!" exclaimed the baronet, with an air of affected triumph. "This, you see, Mr. John Effingham, is in aid of my argument."

"I am quite of your opinion," returned the gentleman addressed—"as much native aristocracy as you please, but no hereditary."

The entrance of Eve and Mademoiselle Vieffville interrupted this pleasantry, and the carriages being just then announced, John Effingham went in quest of Captain Truck, who was in the drawing-room with Mr. Effingham and Aristobulus.

"I have left Ned to discuss trespass-suits and leases with his land agent," said John Effingham, as he followed Eve to the street-door. "By ten o'clock, they will have taxed a pretty bill of costs between them!"

Mademoiselle Vieffville followed John Effingham; Grace came next; and Sir George Templemore and the captain brought up the rear. Grace wondered that the young baronet did not offer her his arm, for she had been accustomed to receive this attention from the other sex, in a hundred situations in which it was rather an incumbrance than a service: Sir George, however, would have hesitated about offering such assistance, as an act of uncalled-for familiarity.

Miss Van Courtlandt being much in society, kept a chariot for her own use, and the three ladies took their seats in it, while the gentlemen took possession of Mr. Effingham's coach. The order was given to drive to Spring Street, and the whole party proceeded.

The acquaintance between the Effinghams and Mrs. Jarvis had arisen from their being near, and, in a certain sense, sociable neighbours in the country. Their town associations, however, were as distinct as if they dwelt in different hemispheres, with the exception of an occasional morning call, and, now and then, of a family dinner given by Mr. Effingham. Such had been the nature of the intercourse previously to the family of the latter going abroad, and there were now symptoms of its being renewed on the same quiet and friendly footing as formerly. No two beings could be less alike, in many respects, than Mr. Jarvis and his wife. The former was a plain, pains-taking, sensible man of business, while the latter had a craving desire to figure in the world of fashion. The first was perfectly aware that Mr. Effingham in education, habits, associations, and manners, at least, was of a class entirely distinct from his own, and without troubling himself to analyze the cause, and without any feeling of envy or of unkindness, he was totally exempt from any undue deference or unmanly cringing, and quietly submitted to let things take their course. His wife, on the other hand, not unfrequently expressed her surprise that any one in New York should presume to be better than themselves; and a remark of this nature gave rise to the following short conversation, on the very morning of the day on which she entertained the party to which we are now conducting the reader.

“How do you know, my dear, that any one does think himself better than ourselves?” demanded the husband.

“Why do they not all visit us then?”

“Why do you not visit everybody yourself? a pretty household we should have, if you visited everybody who lives even in this one street.”

“You surely would not have me visiting all the grocers’ wives at the corners, and all the other rubbish of the neighbourhood! What I mean is, that all the people of a certain sort ought to visit all the people of the same sort, in the same town.”

“You surely would make exceptions, at least, on account of number. I saw number three thousand six hundred and fifty this very day on a cart, and if the wives of all these cartmen were to visit one another, each would have to make ten visits daily, in order to get through the list in a twelvemonth.”

“I have always bad luck in making you comprehend these things, Mr. Jarvis.”

“I am afraid, my dear, it is because you do not very clearly comprehend them yourself. You first say that everybody ought to visit everybody, and then you insist you will visit none but those you think good enough to be visited by Mrs. Jared Jarvis.”

“What I mean is, that no one in New York has a right to think himself better than we are.”

“Better? In what sense better?”

“In such a sense as to induce them to think themselves too good to visit us.”

“That may be your opinion, my dear, but others may judge differently. You clearly think yourself too good to visit Mrs. Onion, the grocer’s wife, who is a capital woman in her way; and how do we know that certain people may not fancy we are not quite refined enough for them? Refinement is a positive thing, Mrs. Jarvis, and has much more influence on the pleasures of association than money. We may want a hundred little perfections that escape our ignorance, and which those, who are trained to such matters, deem essentials.”

“I never met with a man of so little social spirit, Mr. Jarvis!

Really, you are quite unsuited to be a citizen of a republican country."

"Republican ! I do not really see what republican has to do with the question. In the first place it is a droll word for you to use in this sense, at least ; for, taking your own meaning of the term, you are as anti-republican as any woman I know. But a republic does not necessarily infer equality of condition, or even equality of rights ; it means merely the substitution of the right of the commonwealth for the right of a prince. Had you said a democracy there would have been some plausibility in using the word, though even then its application would have been illogical. If I am a freeman and a democrat, I hope I have the justice to allow others to be just as free and democratic as I am myself."

"And who wishes the contrary?—all I claim is to be considered a fit associate for anybody in this country—in these United States of America."

"I would quit these United States of America next week, if I thought there existed any necessity for such an intolerable state of things."

"Mr. Jarvis!—and you, too, one of the committee of Tammany Hall!"

"Yes, Mrs. Jarvis, and I one of the committee of Tammany Hall! What! do you think I want the three thousand six hundred and fifty cartmen running in and out of my house, with their tobacco saliva and pipes, all day long?"

"Who is thinking of your cartmen and grocers? I speak now only of genteel people."

"In other words, my dear, you are thinking only of those whom you fancy to have the advantage of you, and keep those who think of you in the same way quite out of sight. This is not my democracy and freedom. I believe that it requires two people to make a bargain, and although I may consent to dine with A——, if A—— will not consent to dine with me, there is an end of the matter."

"Now you have come to a case in point. You often dined with Mr. Effingham before he went abroad, and yet you would never allow me to ask Mr. Effingham to dine with us. That is what I call meanness."

"It might be so, indeed, if it were done to save my money. I dined with Effingham because I like him, because he was an old neighbour, because he asked me, and because I found a pleasure in the quiet elegance of his table and society ; and I did not ask him to dine with me, because I was satisfied he would be better pleased with such a tacit acknowledgment of his superiority in this respect, than by any bustling and ungraceful efforts to pay him in kind. Edward Effingham has dinners enough, without keeping a debtor and credit account with his guests, which is rather too New Yorkish, even for me."

"Bustling and ungraceful!" repeated Mrs. Jarvis, bitterly. "I do not know that you are at all more bustling and ungraceful than Mr. Effingham himself."

"No, my dear, I am a quiet, unpretending man, like the great majority of my countrymen, thank God!"

"Then why talk of these sorts of differences, in a country in which the law establishes none?"

"For precisely the reason that I talk of the river at the foot of this street, or because there is a river. A thing may exist without there being a law for it. There is no law for building this house, and yet it is built. There is no law for making Dr. Versa a better preacher than Mr. Prolix, and yet he is a much better preacher; neither is there any law for making Mr. Effingham a more finished gentleman than I happen to be, and yet I am not fool enough to deny the fact. In the way of making out a bill of parcels, I will not turn my back to him, I can promise you, or to his cousin John Effingham either."

"All this strikes me as being very spiritless, and as particularly anti-republican," said Mrs. Jarvis, rising to quit the room; "and if the Effinghams do not come this evening, I shall not enter their house again this winter. I am sure they have no right to pretend to be our betters, and I feel no disposition to admit the impudent claim."

"Before you go, Jane, let me say a parting word," rejoined the husband, looking for his hat, "which is just this. If you wish the world to believe you the equal of any one, no matter whom, don't be always talking about it, lest they see you distrust the fact yourself. A positive thing will surely be seen, and they who have the highest claims are the least disposed to be always pressing them on the attention of the world. An outrage may certainly be committed upon those social rights which have been established by common consent; and then it may be proper to resent it; but beware betraying a consciousness of your own inferiority, by letting every one see you are jealous of your station. Now, kiss me; here is the money to pay for your finery this evening, and let me see you as happy to receive Mrs. Jewett from Albion Place as you would be to receive Mrs. Hawker herself."

"Mrs. Hawker!" cried the wife, with a toss of her head; "I would not cross the street to invite Mrs. Hawker and all her clan,"—which was very true, as Mrs. Jarvis was thoroughly convinced the trouble would be unavailing, the lady in question being as near the head of fashion in New York as it was possible to be in

in a town that, in a moral sense, resembles an encampment quite as much as it resembles a permanent and a long-existing capital.

Notwithstanding a great deal of management on the part of Mrs. Jarvis to get showy personages to attend her entertainment, the simple elegance of the two carriages that bore the Effingham party threw all the other equipages into the shade. The arrival, indeed, was deemed a matter of so much moment that intelligence was conveyed to the lady, who was still at her post in the inner drawing-room, of the arrival of a party altogether superior to any that had yet appeared in her rooms. It is true, this was not expressed in words, but it was made sufficiently obvious by the breathless haste and the air of importance of Mrs. Jarvis' sister, who had received the news from a servant, and who communicated it in propria personâ to the mistress of the house.

The simple, useful, graceful, almost indispensable usage of announcing at the door, indispensable to those who receive much and where there is the risk of meeting people known to us by name and not in person, is but little practised in America. Mrs. Jarvis would have shrunk from such an innovation, had she known that elsewhere the custom prevailed, but she was in happy ignorance on this point, as on many others that were more essential to the much-coveted social éclat at which she aimed. When Mademoiselle Vieffville appeared, therefore, walking unsupported, followed by Eve and Grace and the gentlemen of their party, she at first supposed there was some mistake, and that her visitors had got into the wrong house, there actually being an opposition party in the neighbourhood.

"What brazen people!" whispered Mrs. Abijah Gross, who, having removed from an interior New England village two years previously, fancied herself au fait in all the niceties of breeding and social tact:—"there are positively two young ladies walking about without gentlemen!"

But it was not in the power of Mrs. Abijah Gross, with her audible whisper and obvious sneer and laugh, to put down two such lovely creatures as Eve and her cousin. The simple elegance of their attire, the indescribable air of polish, particularly of the former, and the surpassing beauty and modesty of mien of both, effectually silenced criticism, after this solitary outbreking of vulgarity. Mrs. Jarvis recognised Eve and John Effingham, and her hurried compliments and obvious delight proclaimed to all near her the importance she attached to this visit. Mademoiselle Vieffville she did not at first recollect in her present dress, but as soon as she did she overwhelmed her with expressions of delight and satisfaction.

"I wish particularly to present to you a friend that we all prize exceedingly," said Eve, as soon as there was an opportunity of speaking. "This is Captain Truck, the gentleman who commands the Montauk, the ship of which you have heard so much. Ah! Mr. Jarvis," offering a hand to him with a sincere cordiality, for Eve had known him from childhood, and always sincerely respected him, "you will receive my friend with a cordial welcome, I am certain."

Eve then explained to Mr. Jarvis who the honest captain was, and he, after first paying the proper respects to his other guests, led the old sailor aside, and began an earnest conversation on the subject of the recent passage.

John Effingham presented the baronet, whom Mrs. Jarvis, out of pure ignorance of his rank in his own country, received with perfect propriety and self-respect.

"We have very few people of note in town at present, I believe," said Mrs. Jarvis to John Effingham. "A great traveller, a most interesting man, is the only person of that sort I could obtain for this evening, and I shall have great pleasure in introducing you. He is there in that crowd, for he is in the greatest possible demand; he has seen so much! Mrs. Snow, with your permission—really the ladies are thronging about him as if he were a Pawnee—have the goodness to step a little this way, Mr. Effingham—Miss Effingham. Mrs. Snow, just touch his arm, and let him know I wish to introduce a couple of friends. Mr. Dodge,—Mr. John Effingham, Miss Effingham, Miss Van Courtlandt. I hope you may succeed in getting him a little to yourselves, ladies, for he can tell you all about Europe—saw the king of France riding out to Neuilly, and has a prodigious knowledge of things on the other side of the water."

It required a good deal of Eve's habitual self-command to suppress a smile, but she had the tact and discretion to receive Steadfast as an utter stranger. John Effingham bowed as haughtily as man can bow, and then it was whispered that he and Mr. Dodge were rival travellers. The distance of the former, coupled with an expression of countenance that did not invite familiarity, drove nearly all the company over to the side of Steadfast, who, it was soon settled, had seen much more of the world, understood society better, and had moreover travelled as far as Timbuctoo in Africa. The clientelle of Mr. Dodge increased rapidly, as these reports spread in the rooms; and those who had not read the "delightful letters" published in the "Free Inquirer," furiously envied those who had enjoyed that high advantage.

"It is Mr. Dodge, the great traveller," said one young lady who had extricated herself from the crowd around the "lion," and taken a station near Eve and Grace, and who, moreover, was a blue in her own set; "his beautiful and accurate descriptions have attracted great attention in England, and it is said they have actually been republished."

"Have you read them, Miss Brackett?"

"Not the letters themselves, absolutely, but all the remarks on them in the last week's Hebdomad. Most delightful letters, judging from these remarks; full of nature and point, and singularly accurate in all their facts. In this respect they are invaluable—travellers fall into such extraordinary errors!"

"I hope, ma'am," said John Effingham, gravely, "that the gentleman has avoided the capital mistake of commenting on things that actually exist. People generally esteem comments on the facts of their country impertinent and unjust; and your true way to succeed, is to comment as freely as possible on imaginary peculiarities."

Miss Brackett had nothing to answer to this observation, the Hebdomad having never, among its other profundities, thought proper to touch on the subject. She went on praising the "Letters," however, not one of which had she read, or would read; for this young lady had contrived to gain a high reputation in her own coterie for taste and knowledge in books, by merely skimming the strictures of those who usually themselves only skim the works they pretend to analyze.

Eve had never before been in such close contact with so much flippant ignorance, and she could not but wonder that a man like her kinsman should be overlooked, and such a man as Mr. Dodge be preferred. All this gave John Effingham himself no concern; but retiring a little from the crowd, he entered into a short conversation with the young baronet.

"I should like to know your real opinion of this set," he said; "not that I plead guilty to the childish sensibility that is so common in all provincial circles to the judgment of strangers, but with a view to aid you in forming a just estimate of the real state of the country."

"As I know the precise connection between you and our host, there can be no objection to giving a perfectly frank reply. The women strike me as being singularly delicate and pretty; well dressed too, I may add; but, while there is a great air of decency, there is very little high finish, and yet it is remarkable that there is scarcely any downright vulgarity or coarseness."

"A Daniel come to judgment! One who had passed a life here would not have come so near the truth, simply because he would not have observed peculiarities that require the means of comparison to be detected. You are a little too indulgent in saying there is no downright vulgarity; for some there is, though surprisingly little for the circumstances ; but of the coarseness that would be so prominent elsewhere there is hardly any. Now, so great is the equality in all things in this country, so direct the tendency to this respectable mediocrity, that what you see here to night, may be seen in almost every village in the land, with a few immaterial exceptions only in the way of furniture and other city appliances.

“Certainly, for mediocrity, this is respectable, though a fastidious taste might see a multitude of faults.”

“I will not call the taste merely fastidious, for while there is much that would be missed only by the over-sophisticated, much is really wanting that would add to the grace and true beauty of society. Those young men, who are sniggering over some bad joke in the corner, for instance, are positively vulgar ; so is that young lady who is indulging in practical coquetry ; but, on the whole, there is little of this ; and, even our hostess, a silly woman devoured with the desire of being what neither her social position, education, habits, nor notions fit her to be, is less obtrusive, bustling, and offensive, than a similar person would be elsewhere.”

“I am quite of your way of thinking, and intended to ask you to account for it.”

“The Americans are of necessity an imitative people, and they are apt at this part of imitation, in particular. They are also less artificial in all their practices than older and more sophisticated nations ; and this company has that essential part of good-breeding, simplicity, as it were par force. A step higher in the social scale you will see less of it, for greater daring and bad models lead to blunders in matters that require to be exceedingly well done, if done at all. The faults here would be more apparent, by approaching near enough to learn the tone of mind, the forms of speech, and the attempts at wit.”

“Which I think we shall escape to-night, as I see the ladies are already making their apologies and taking leave. We must defer this investigation to another time.”

“It may be indefinitely postponed, as it would scarcely reward the trouble of an inquiry.”

The gentlemen now approached Mrs. Jarvis, paid their parting compliments, hunted up Captain Truck, whom they tore by violence from the good-natured hospitality of the master of the house, and then escorted the ladies to their carriage. As they drove off the worthy mariner protested that Mr. Jarvis was one of the honestest men he had ever met, and announced that he intended giving him a dinner on board the Montauk the very next day.

The dwelling of Mrs. Hawker was in Hudson Square, or in a portion of the city that the lovers of the grandiose are endeavouring to call St. John's Park, for it is rather an amusing peculiarity among a certain portion of the emigrants who have flocked into the State of New York within the last thirty years, that they are not satisfied with permitting any family or thing to possess the name it originally had, if the least opportunity arises to change it. There was but a carriage or two before the door, though the strong lights, and the appearance of things in the house showed that the company had assembled.

"Mrs Hawker is the widow and the daughter of men of long-established New York families;" said John Effingham, as the party was driving from one house to the other. "She is childless, affluent, and universally respected where known, for her breeding, benevolence, good-sense, and heart. Were you to go into most of the sets of this town, and mention Mrs. Hawker's name, not one person in ten would know there is such a being in their vicinity, the pêle-mêle of a migratory population keeping persons of her character and condition in life quite out of view. The very persons who will prattle by the hour of the establishments of Mrs. Peleg Pond, and Mrs. Jonah Twist, and Mrs. Abiram Wattles, people who first appeared on this island five or six years since, and, who having accumulated what to them are relatively large fortunes, have launched out into vulgar finery, would look with surprise at hearing Mrs. Hawker mentioned as a person having any claims to social distinction. Her historical names are overshadowed in their mind by the parochial glories of certain local prodigies in the townships whence they emigrated; her manners would puzzle the comprehension of people whose imitation has not gone beyond the surface, and her polished and simple mind would find little sympathy among a class who seldom rise above commonplace sentiment, without getting upon stilts."

"Mrs. Hawker, then, is a lady," quietly observed Sir George Templemore.

"Mrs. Hawker is a lady in every sense of the word; in position, education, manners, association, mind, fortune, and birth. I do not know that we ever had a greater number of her class than we have at present, but certainly they were once more prominent in society."

"I suppose, sir," said Captain Truck, "that this Mrs. Hawker is of what is called the old school?"

"Of a very ancient school, and one that is likely to continue, though it may not be very generally attended, since it is founded in natural laws."

"I am afraid, Mr. John Effingham, that I shall be like a fish out of water in such a house. I can get along very well with your Mrs. Jarvis, and with the dear young lady in the other carriage, but the sort of woman you have described will be apt to jam a plain mariner like myself. What in nature should I do, now, if she should ask me to dance a minuet?"

"Dance it, agreeably to the laws of nature," returned John Effingham, as the carriage stopped.

A respectable, quiet, and aged black servant admitted the party, but did not announce the visitors, as he held the door of the drawing-room open for them. With respectful attention Mrs. Hawker arose, and advanced to meet Eve and her companions, and, though she kissed the cousins affectionately, her reception of Mademoiselle Vieffville was so simply polite, as to convince the latter she was valued on account of her services. John Effingham, who was ten or fifteen years the junior of the old lady, gallantly kissed her hand, when he presented his two male companions. After paying proper attention to the greatest stranger, Mrs. Hawker turned to Captain Truck and said:—

"This then is the gentleman to whose skill and courage you all owe so much — we all owe so much, I might more properly have said — the commander of the Montauk?"

"I have the honour of commanding that vessel, ma'am," returned Captain Truck, who was singularly awed by the dignified simplicity of his hostess, although her quiet, natural, and yet finished manner, which extended even to the intonation of the voice and the smallest movement, was as unlike what he had expected as possible; "and with such passengers as she had last voyage, I can only say it is a pity that she is not better off for one to take care of her."

"Your passengers give a different account of the matter, but, in order that I may judge impartially, do me the favour to take this chair, and let me learn a few of the particulars from yourself."

Observing that Sir George Templemore had followed Eve to the other side of the room, Mrs. Hawker resumed her seat, and, without neglecting her guests generally to attend to one in particular, or attending to one in any way to make him feel oppressed, she contrived, in a few minutes, to make the captain forget all about the minuet, and to feel much more at his ease than Mrs. Jarvis would have done in a month's intercourse.

In the mean time, Eve had crossed the room to join a lady whose smile invited her to her side. This was a young, slight-framed female of a pleasing countenance; but who would not have been particularly distinguished, in such a place, for personal charms. Still her smile was sweet, her eyes were soft, and the expression of her face was what might be called illuminated. As Sir George Templemore followed her, Eve mentioned his name to her acquaintance, whom she addressed as Mrs. Bloomfield.

"You are bent on perpetrating further gaiety to-night," said the latter, glancing at the ball-dresses of the two cousins. "Are you in the colours of the Houston faction or in those of the Peabody?"

"Not in peagreen, certainly," returned Eve, laughing—"as you may see; but simple white."

"You intend then to be 'led a measure' at Mrs. Houston's. It were more suitable there than among the other faction."

"Is fashion, then, factious, in New York?" inquired Sir George.

"Fractious would be a better word, perhaps. But we have parties in almost everything, in America; in politics, religion, temperance, speculations, and taste; why not in fashion?"

"I fear we are not quite independent enough to form parties on such a subject," said Eve.

"Perfectly well said, Miss Effingham; one must think a little originally, let it be ever so falsely, in order to get up a fashion. I fear we shall have to admit our insignificance on this point. You are a late arrival, Sir George Templemore?"

"As lately as the commencement of this month; I had the honour of being a fellow-passenger with Mr. Effingham and his family."

"In which voyage you suffered shipwreck, captivity, and famine, if half one hears be true."

"Report has a little magnified our risks; we encountered some serious dangers, but nothing amounting to the suffering you have mentioned."

"Being a married woman, and having arrived at the crisis in which deception is never practised, I do not expect to hear truth again," said Mrs. Bloomfield smiling. "I trust, however, you underwent enough to qualify you all for heroes and heroines, and shall content myself with knowing that you are here, safe and happy—if," she added, looking inquiringly at Eve, "one who has been educated abroad can be happy at home."

"One educated abroad may be happy at home, though possibly not in the modes most practised by the world," said Eve, firmly.

"Without an opera—without a court—almost without society?"

"An opera would be desirable I confess; of courts I know nothing, unmarried females being cyphers in Europe; and I hope better things than to be without society."

"Unmarried females are considered cyphers too, here—provided there be enough of them, with a good respectable digit at their head. I assure you no one quarrels with the cyphers under such circumstances. I think, Sir George Templemore, a town like this, must be something of a paradox to you."

"May I venture to inquire the reason for this opinion?"

“Merely because it is neither one thing nor another. Not a capital, nor yet merely a provincial place; with something more than commerce in its bosom, and yet with that something hidden under a bushel; a good deal more than Liverpool, and a good deal less than London; better even than Edinburgh in many respects, and worse than Wapping in others.”

“You have been abroad, Mrs. Bloomfield?”

“Not a foot out of my own country; scarcely a foot out of my own state. I have been at Lake George, the Falls, and the Mountain House, and, as one does not travel in a balloon, I saw some of the intermediate places. As for all besides, I am obliged to go by report.”

“It is a pity Mrs. Bloomfield was not with us this evening, at Mrs. Jarvis’s,” said Eve, laughing, “she might there have increased her knowledge, by listening to a few cantos from the epic of Mr. Dodge.”

“I have glanced at some of that author’s wisdom,” returned Mrs. Bloomfield, “but I soon found it was learning backwards. There is a never-failing rule, by which it is easy to arrive at a traveller’s worth, in a negative sense, at least.”

“That is a rule which may be worth knowing,” said the baronet, “as it would save much useless wear of the eyes.”

“When a writer betrays profound ignorance of his own country, it is a fair presumption that he cannot be very acute in his observation of strangers. Mr. Dodge is one of these writers, and a single letter fully satisfied my curiosity. I fear, Miss Effingham, very inferior ware, in the way of manners, has been lately imported in large quantities into this country, having the Tower mark on it.”

Eve laughed, and declared that Sir George Templemore was better qualified than herself to answer such a question.

“We are said to be a people of facts, rather than a people of speculation,” continued Mrs. Bloomfield, without attending to the reference of the young lady, “and any coin that offers passes with us until another that is better arrives. It is a singular, but, I believe, a very general mistake, of the people of this country, to suppose that they can exist under the present régime, when others would fail, because their opinions keep even pace with, or precede, the actual condition of society; whereas those who have thought and observed most on such subjects, agree in thinking the very reverse to be the case.”

“This must be a curious condition for a government so purely conventional,” observed Sir George with interest, “and it certainly is altogether opposed to the state of things that exists all over Europe.”

"It is so, and yet there is no great mystery in it, after all. Accident has liberated us from trammels that still fetter you. We are like a vehicle on the top of a hill, which, the moment it is pushed beyond the point of resistance, rolls down of itself, without the aid of horses. One may follow with the team, and hook on when it gets to the bottom, but there is no such thing as keeping company with it, until it arrives there."

"You will allow, then, that there is a bottom?"

"There is a bottom to everything—to good and bad, happiness and misery, hope, fear, faith, and charity; even to a woman's mind which I have sometimes fancied the most bottomless thing in nature. There may, therefore, well be a bottom even to the institutions of America."

Sir George listened with the interest with which an Englishman of his class always endeavours to catch a concession that he fancies is about to favour his own political predilections, and he felt encouraged to pursue the subject further.

"And you think the political machine is rolling downwards towards this bottom?" he said, with an interest in the answer that, living in the quiet and forgetfulness of his own home, he would have laughed at himself for entertaining. But our sensibilities become quickened by collision, and opposition is known even to create love.

Mrs. Bloomfield was quick-witted, intelligent, cultivated, and shrewd. She perceived Sir George's motive at a glance, and, notwithstanding she saw and felt all the abuses, she was strongly attached to the governing principle of her country's social organisation, as is almost universally the case with the strongest minds and most generous hearts of the nation, and was not, therefore, disposed to let a stranger carry away a false impression of her sentiments on such a point.

"Did you ever study logic, Sir George Templemore?" she asked, archly.

"A little, though not enough I fear to influence my mode of reasoning, or even to make me familiar with the terms."

"Oh! I am not about to assail you with sequiturs and non-sequiturs, dialectics, and all the mysteries of Denk-Lehre, but simply to remind you that there is also such a thing as the bottom of a subject. When I tell you we are flying towards the bottom of our institutions, it is in the intellectual sense, and not, as you have erroneously imagined, in an unintellectual sense. I mean that we are getting to understand them, which I fear we did not absolutely do at the commencement of the experiment."

"But, I think you will admit, that as the civilisation of the country advances, some material change must occur. Your people cannot always remain stationary,—they must either go backwards, or go forwards. ”

“Up or down, if you will allow me to correct your phraseology. The civilisation of the country is, however, in one sense, retrogressive ; the people who do not go ‘up,’ betray a disposition to go ‘down.’ ”

“You deal in enigmas, and I am afraid to think I understand you. ”

“I mean, merely, that the gallows is fast disappearing, and that the people — le peuple you will understand — begin to accept money. In both particulars, I think there is a sensible change for the worse, within my own recollection. ”

Mrs. Bloomfield’s manner then changed from that light-hearted gaiety which often rendered her conversation piquante, and occasionally even brilliant, and she became more grave and explicit. The conversation soon turned upon the subject of punishments, and few men could have reasoned more sensibly, justly, or forcibly, than this slight and fragile-looking young woman. Without the least pedantry, with a beauty of language that the other sex seldom attains, and with a delicacy of discrimination and a sentiment that was strictly feminine, she rendered a theme interesting that, however important in itself, is forbidding ; veiling all its odious and revolting features by the refinement and finesse of her own polished mind.

Eve could have listened all night, and, at every syllable that fell from the lips of her friend, she felt a glow of triumph ; for she was proud of letting an intelligent foreigner see that America contained women worthy to rank with the best of other countries : a fact that they who merely frequented what is called the world, she thought might be reasonably justified in distrusting. In one respect, she fancied Mrs. Bloomfield superior to those of her own sex whom she had so often admired abroad : for her knowledge and cleverness were untrammelled either by the prejudices which are incident to a factitious condition of society, or by their reaction ; two circumstances that often obscured the sense and candour of those to whom she had listened with pleasure in other countries. The singularly feminine tone, too, of all that Mrs. Bloomfield said, or thought, while it lost nothing in strength, added to the charm of her conversation, and increased the pleasure of those that listened.

“Is the circle large to which Mrs. Hawker and her friends belong ? ” asked Sir George, as he assisted Eve and Grace to cloak, when they had taken leave. “A town which can boast of half a dozen such houses as her’s, need not accuse itself of wanting society. ”

"Ah! there is but one Mrs. Hawker in New York," answered Grace, "and not many Mrs. Bloomfields in the world. It would be too much to say, we have even half a dozen such houses as theirs."

"Have you not been struck with the admirable tone of this drawing-room?" half whispered Eve. "It may want a little of that lofty ease that one sees among the better portion of the old Princesses et Duchesses, which is a relic of a school that, it is to be feared, is going out; but, in its place there is a winning nature, with as much dignity as is necessary, and a truth that gives one confidence in the sincerity of those around one."

"Upon my word, I think Mrs. Hawker quite fit to be a duchess."

"You mean a duchesse," said Eve, laughing; "and yet she is without the manner that we understand by such a word. Mrs. Hawker is a lady, and there can be no higher term."

"She is a delightful old woman," cried John Effingham, "and if twenty years younger and disposed to change her condition, I should really be afraid to enter her house."

"My dear sir," interposed the captain, "I would make her Mrs. Truck to-morrow, and say nothing about the years, if she could be content to take up with such an offer. Why, sir, she is no woman, but a saint in petticoats! I felt the whole time as if talking to my own mother; and as for ships, she knows more about them than I do myself; or even that Mr. Powis, who is a paragon in his way."

The whole party laughed at the strength of the captain's admiration, and getting into the carriages, they proceeded to the last of the houses they intended to visit that night.

CHAPTER V.

So turns she every man the wrong side out;
And never gives to truth and virtue, that
Which simpleness and merit purchaseth.

Much Ado about Nothing.

Mrs. Houston was what was termed a fashionable woman in New York. She, also, was of a family of local note, though much less elevated in the olden time than that of Mrs. Hawker. Still her claims were admitted by the most fastidious on such points, for some persons yet remain who think descent indispensable to gentility. As her means were ample, and her tastes, perhaps, superior to those of most around her, she kept what was thought a house of better tone than common, even in the highest circle. Eve had but a slight acquaintance with her; but in Grace's eyes, Mrs. Houston's was the place of all others that she thought might make a favourable impression on her cousin. Her wish that this might prove to be the case was so strong that, as they drove towards the door, she could not forbear making an attempt to prepare Eve for what she was to meet.

"Although Mrs. Houston has a very large house for New York, and lives in a uniform style, you are not to expect ante-chambers, and vast suites of rooms, Eve," said Grace, "such as you have been accustomed to see abroad."

"It is not necessary, my dear cousin, to enter a house of four or five windows in front, to see it is not a house of twenty or thirty. I should be very unreasonable to expect an Italian Palazzo, or a Parisian hotel, in this good town."

"We are not old enough for that yet, Eve; a hundred years hence, Mademoiselle Viefville, such things may exist here."

"Bien sûr. C'est naturel."

"A hundred years hence, as the world tends, Grace, they are more likely not to exist anywhere, except as taverns, or hospitals, or manufactories. But what have we to do, coz, with a century ahead of us? young as we both are, we cannot hope to live all that time."

Grace would have been puzzled to account satisfactorily to herself for the strong desire she felt that neither of her companions should expect to see such a house as their senses so plainly told them did not exist in the place; but her foot moved in the bottom of the carriage, for she was not half satisfied with her cousin's answer.

"All I mean, Eve," she said, after a pause, "is, that one ought not to expect, in a town as new as this, the improvements that one sees in an older state of society."

"And have Mademoiselle Viefville or I ever been so weak as to suppose that New York is Paris, or Rome, or Vienna?"

Grace was still less satisfied, for, unknown to herself, she had hoped Mrs. Houston's ball might be quite equal to a ball in either of those ancient capitals, and she was now vexed that her cousin considered it so much as a matter of course that it should not be. But there was no time for explanation, as the carriage now stopped.

The noise, confusion, calling out, swearing, and rude clamour before the door of Mrs. Houston, said little for this part of the arrangement. Coachmen are nowhere a particularly silent and civil class, but the uncouth European peasants who have been preferred to the honours of the whip in New York, added to the usual feelings of competition and contention that distinguish the occupation the sentiment that is so well known to distinguish "the beggar on horseback." The imposing equipages of our party, however, had that effect on most of these rude brawlers that a display of wealth is known to produce on the vulgar-minded; and the ladies got into the house through a lane of coachmen, by yielding a little to a chevaux-de-frise of whips, without any serious calamity.

"One hardly knows which is the most terrific," said Eve, involuntarily, as soon as the door closed on them—"the noise within, or the noise without."

This was spoken rapidly and in French to Mademoiselle Viefville, but Grace heard and understood it, and for the first time in her life she perceived that Mrs. Houston's company was not composed of nightingales. The surprise is, that the discovery should have come so late.

"I am delighted at having got into this house," said Sir George, who, having thrown his cloak to his own servant, stood with the two other gentlemen waiting the descent of the ladies from the upper room, where the bad arrangements of the house compelled them to uncloak and to put aside their shawls, "as I am told it is the best house in town to see the other sex."

"To hear them would be nearer the truth, perhaps," returned John Effingham, in his dry manner; "as for pretty women, one can hardly go amiss in New York; and one of your senses now tells you that they do not come into the world to be seen only."

The baronet smiled, but he was too well-bred to contradict or to assent. — Mademoiselle Viefville, unconscious that she was violating the proprieties, walked into the rooms by herself as soon as she descended, followed by Eve; but Grace shrank to the side of John Effingham, whose arm she took, as a step necessary even to decorum.

Mrs. Houston received her guests with ease and dignity. She was one of those females that the American calls gay; in other words, she opened her own house to a very promiscuous society, ten or a dozen times in a winter, and accepted the greater part of the invitations she received to other people's. Still, in most other countries, as a fashionable woman, she would have been esteemed a model of devotion to the duties of a wife and a mother, for she paid personal attention to her household, and had actually taught all her children the Lord's Prayer, the creed, and the ten commandments. She attended church twice every Sunday, and stayed at home from the evening lectures, only that the domestics might have an opportunity of going (which, by the way, they never did,) in her stead. Feminine, well-mannered, rich, pretty, of a very positive social condition, and naturally kind-hearted and disposed to sociability, Mrs. Houston, supported by an indulgent husband, who so much liked to see people with the appearance of happiness that he was not particular as to the means, had found no difficulty in rising to the pinnacle of fashion, and of having her name in the mouths of all those who found it necessary to talk of a somebody, in order that they might seem to be somebodies themselves. All this contributed to Mrs. Houston's happiness, or she fancied it did; and as every passion is known to increase by indulgence, she had insensibly gone on in her much envied career, until, as has just been said, she reached the summit.

"These rooms are very crowded," said Sir George, glancing his eyes around two very pretty little narrow drawing-rooms, that were beautifully, not to say richly, furnished: "it is surprising that the same contracted style of building should be so very general in a town that increases so rapidly as this, and where fashion has no fixed abode, and land is so abundant."

"Mrs. Bloomfield would tell you," said Eve, "that these houses are types of the social state of the country, in which no one is permitted to occupy more than his own share of ground."

"But there are reasonably large dwellings in the place—Mrs. Hawker has a good house, and your father's, for instance, would be thought so, too, even in London; and yet, I think you will agree with me in saying that a good room is almost unseen in New York."

"I certainly agree with you in this particular; to meet with a good room, we must go into the houses that were built thirty years ago. We have inherited these snuggeries, however, for London has not much to boast of in the way of houses."

"In the way of town residences, I perfectly agree with you, as a whole, though we have some capital exceptions: still, I do not think we are quite so compact as this. Do you not fancy the noise increased in consequence of its being so confined?"

Eve laughed, and shook her head most positively.

"What would it be, if fairly let out?" she said. "We must not lose the precious moments, however, but turn our eyes about us in quest of the belles. Grace, you who are so much at home must be our cicerone, and tell us which are the idols we are to worship."

"Dites-moi, premièrement, que veut dire une belle, à New York?" demanded Mademoiselle Viefville. "Apparemment tout le monde est joli."

"A belle, Mademoiselle," returned John Effingham, "is not necessarily beautiful, the qualifications for the character being various and a little contradictory. One may be a belle, by means of money, a tongue, an eye, a foot, teeth, a laugh, or any other separate feature or grace; though no woman was ever yet a belle, I believe, by means of the head, considered collectively. But why deal in description when the thing itself confronts us? The young lady standing directly before us is a bell of the most approved stamp, and silvery tone. Is it not Miss Ring, Grace?"

The answer was in the affirmative, and the eyes of the whole party turned towards the subject of this remark. The young lady in question was about twenty, rather tall for an American woman, not conspicuously handsome, but like most around her of delicate features and frame, and with such a physique as, under proper training, would have rendered her the beau idéal of feminine delicacy and gentleness. She had natural spirit, it is true, as appeared in her clear blue eye, and moreover she had the spirit to be a belle.

Around this young creature were clustered no less than five young men, dressed in the height of the fashion, all of whom seemed to be entranced with the words that fell from her lips, and each of them evidently anxious to say something clever in return. They all laughed, the lady most, and sometimes all spoke at once. Notwithstanding these outbreakings, Miss Ring did most of the talking, and once or twice, as a young man would gape after a most exhilarating show of merriment, and discover an inclination to retreat, she managed to recall him to his allegiance by some remark particularly pertinent to himself or to his feelings.

"Qui est cette dame?" asked Mademoiselle Vieffville, very much as one would put a similar question, on seeing a man enter a church, during service, with his hat on.

"Elle est demoiselle," returned Eve.

"Quelle horreur!"

"Nay, nay, Mademoiselle, I will not allow you to set up France as immaculate on this point either," said John Effingham, looking at the last speaker with an affected frown—"a young lady may even speak to a young gentleman, and not be guilty of felony, although I will admit that five tongues are unnecessary, and that five listeners are more than sufficient for the wisdom of twenty in petticoats."

"C'est une horreur!"

"I dare say Miss Ring would think it a greater horror to be obliged to pass an evening in a row of girls unspoken to, except to be asked to dance, and admired only in the distance. But let us take seats on this sofa, and then we may go beyond the pantomime, and become partakers in the sentiment of the scene."

Grace and Eve were now led off to dance, and the others did as John Effingham had suggested. In the eyes of the belle and her admirers they who had passed thirty were of no account, and our listeners succeeded in establishing themselves quietly within ear-shot—and this was almost at duelling distance too,—without at all interrupting the regular action of the piece. We extract a little of the dialogue, by way of giving a more dramatic representation of what passed.

“Do you not think the youngest Miss Danvers beautiful?” asked the belle, while her eye wandered in search of a sixth gentleman to “entertain,” as the phrase is. “In my opinion she is absolutely the prettiest female in the rooms of Mrs. Houston to-night.”

The young men, one and all, protested against this judgment, and with perfect truth, for Miss Ring was much too original to point out charms that every one else could see.

“They say it will not be a match between her and Mr. Egbert, after everybody has supposed it all settled so long. What is your opinion, Mr. Edson?”

This timely question prevented Mr. Edson’s retreat, for he had actually got so far in this important evolution as to have gaped and turned his back. Recalled, as it were, by the sound of the bugle, Mr. Edson was compelled to say something, a sore affliction to him always.

“Oh! I’m quite of your way of thinking; they have certainly courted too long ever to think of marrying.”

“I detest long courtships; they must be perfect antidotes to love; are they not, Mr. Moreland?”

A truant glance of Mr. Moreland’s eye was rebuked by this appeal, and instead of looking for a place of refuge, he now merely looked sheepish. He, however, entirely agreed with the young lady, as the surest and promptest way of getting out of the difficulty.

“Pray, Mr. Summerfield, how do you like the last hajji—Miss Eve Effingham? To my notion she is prettyish, though by no means as well as her cousin Miss Van Courtlandt, who is really rather good-looking.”

As Eve and Grace were the two most truly lovely young women in the rooms, this opinion, as well as the loud tone in which it was given, startled Mademoiselle Viefville quite as much as the subjects that the belle had selected for this public discussion. She would have moved, as listening to a conversation that was not meant for their ears, but John Effingham quietly assured her that Miss Ring seldom spoke in company without intending as many persons as possible to hear her. There would be no use in changing their seats, moreover, the whole action of the piece consisting principally of private opinions uttered in a public manner.

"Miss Effingham is very plainly dressed for an only daughter," continued the young lady, "though that lace of her cousin's is real point! I'll engage it cost every cent of ten dollars a yard! They are both engaged to be married, I hear."

"Ciel!" exclaimed Mademoiselle Viefville.

"Oh! that is nothing," observed John Effingham, coolly. "Wait a moment, and you will hear that they have been privately married these six months, if, indeed, you hear no worse."

"Of course this is but an idle tale?" said Sir George Templemore, with a concern, which, in despite of his good breeding, compelled him to put a question that, under other circumstances, would scarcely have been permissible.

"As true as the gospel. But listen to the bell—it is ringing for the good of the whole parish."

"The affair between Miss Effingham and Mr. Morpeth, who knew her abroad, I understand is entirely broken off; some say the father objected to Mr. Morpeth's want of fortune, others that the lady was fickle, while some accuse the gentleman of the same vice. Don't you think it shocking to jilt, in either sex, Mr. Mosely?"

The retiring Mr. Mosely was drawn again within the circle, and was obliged to confess that he thought it was very shocking in either sex to jilt.

"If I were a man," continued the belle, "I should never think of a young woman who had once jilted a lover. To my mind it bespeaks a bad heart, and a woman with a bad heart cannot make a very amiable wife."

"What an exceedingly clever creature she is," whispered Mr. Mosely to Mr. Moreland, and he made up his mind to remain and be "entertained" some time longer.

"I think poor Mr. Morpeth greatly to be pitied, for no man can be so silly as to be attentive, seriously, to a lady, without encouragement. Encouragement is the ne plus ultra of courtship: are you not of my opinion, Mr. Walworth?"

Mr. Walworth was number five of the entertainees, and he did understand Latin, of which the young lady, though fond of using scraps, knew nothing. He smiled an assent, therefore, and the belle felicitated herself on having "entertained" him effectually, nor was she much mistaken.

"Indeed, they say Miss Effingham had several affairs of the heart while she was in Europe, but it seems she was unfortunate in them all."

"Mais ceci est trop fort! Je ne veux plus écouter."

“My dear Mademoiselle, compose yourself. The crisis is not yet arrived.”

“I understand she still corresponds with a German baron and an Italian marquis, though both engagements are absolutely broken off. Some people say she walks into company alone, unsupported by any gentleman, by way of announcing her firm determination to remain single for life.”

A common exclamation from the young men proclaimed their disapprobation, and that night three of them actually repeated the thing as a well-established truth; and two of the three, failing of something better to talk about, also announced the additional information that Eve was engaged to be married.

“There is something extremely indelicate in a young lady’s moving about a room without having a gentleman’s arm to lean on! I always feel as if such a person was out of place, and ought to be in the kitchen.”

“But Miss Ring, what well-bred person does it?” sputtered Mr. Moreland. “No one ever heard of such a thing in good society.”

“’Tis quite shocking! altogether unprecedented!”

“It strikes me as being excessively coarse!”

“Oh! manifestly,—quite rustic!” exclaimed Mr. Edson.

“What can possibly be more vulgar?” added Mr. Walworth.

“I never heard of such a thing, among the right sort!” said Mr. Mosely.

“A young lady who can be so brazen as to come into a room, without a gentleman’s arm to lean on, is, in my judgment, at least but indifferently educated, Hajji, or no Hajji. Mr. Edson, have you ever felt the tender passion? I know you have been desperately in love once at least; do describe to me some of the symptoms, in order that I may know when I am attacked myself, seriously, with the disease.”

“Mais, ceci est ridicule! L’enfant s’est sauvée du Charenton de New York.”

“From the nursery rather, Mademoiselle; you perceive she does not yet know how to walk alone.”

Mr. Edson now protested that he was too stupid to feel a passion so intellectual as that of love, and that he was afraid he was destined by nature to remain as insensible as a block.

“One never knows, Mr. Edson,” said the young lady encouragingly—“several of my acquaintances who thought themselves quite safe, have been seized suddenly, and, though none have actually died, more than one has been roughly treated, I assure you.”

Here the young men, one and all, protested that she was excessively clever! Then succeeded a pause, for Miss Ring was inviting, by her eyes, a number six to join her circle, her ambition being dissatisfied with five entertainees, as she saw that Miss Trumpet, a rival belle, had managed to get together exactly that number, also, in the other room. All the gentlemen availed themselves of the cessation in wit to gape, and Mr. Edson took the occasion to remark to Mr. Summerfield that he understood "lots had been sold in seven hundredth street that morning as high as two hundred dollars a lot."

The quadrille now ended, and Eve returned towards her friends. As she approached, the whole party unavoidably compared her quiet, simple, feminine, and yet dignified air, with the restless, beau-catching, and worldly look of the belle, and wondered by what law of nature, or of fashion, the one could possibly become the subject of the other's comments. Eve never appeared better than on that evening. Her dress had all the accuracy and finish of a Parisian toilette, being equally removed from exaggeration and neglect, and it was worn with the ease of one accustomed to be always elegantly attired and yet never decked with finery. Her step, even, was that of a lady, having neither the mincing tread of a Paris grisette, (a manner that sometimes ascends even to the bourgeoise,) the march of a cockneyess, nor the tiptoe swing of a belle; but it was the natural though regulated step of a trained and delicate woman. Walk alone she could certainly, and always did, except on those occasions of ceremony that demanded a partner. Her countenance, also, across which an unworthy thought had never left a trace, was an index to the purity, high principles, and womanly self-respect that controlled all her actions, and in these particulars was the very opposite of the feverish, half-hoydenish, half-affected expression of that of Miss Ring.

"They may say what they please," muttered Captain Truck, clenching his fist, for he had been a silent but wondering witness of all that passed; "she is worth as many of them as could be stowed into the Montauk's lower hold."

Miss Ring, perceiving Eve approach, was desirous of saying something to her, for there was an éclat about a Hajji, after all, that rendered an acquaintance, or even an intimacy, desirable; and she smiled and curtsied. Eve returned the salutation, but as she did not care to approach a group of six, of which no less than five were men, she continued to move towards her own party. This reserve induced Miss Ring to advance a step or two, when Eve was compelled to stop. Curtseying to her partner, she thanked him for his attention, relinquished his arm, and turned to meet the lady. At the same instant the five "entertainees" escaped in a body, equally rejoiced at their release and proud of their captivity.

"I have been dying to come and speak to you, Miss Effingham," commenced Miss Ring; "but these five giants" (she emphasized the word we have put in italics) "so beset me, that escape was quite impossible. There ought to be a law that but one gentleman should speak to a lady at a time."

"I thought there was such a law already," said Eve, smiling.

"You mean in the code of good breeding; but no one thinks of these antiquated laws now-a-days. Are you beginning to be reconciled a little to your own country?"

"It is not easy to effect a reconciliation where there has been no misunderstanding; I hope I have not quarrelled with my country, nor my country with me."

"Oh! it is not exactly that I mean. Cannot one need a reconciliation without a quarrel? What do you say to this, Mr. Edson?"

Miss Ring, having detected some symptoms of desertion in the gentleman addressed, had thrown in this question by way of recall; when, turning to note its effect, she perceived that all of her clientelle had escaped. A look of surprise, and mortification, and vexation, it was not in her power to suppress; and then came one of horror.

"How conspicuous we have made ourselves, and it is all my fault!" she said, for the first time that evening permitting her voice to fall to a becoming tone. "Why, here we actually are, two ladies conversing together, and no gentleman near us!"

"Is that being conspicuous?" asked Eve, with a simplicity that was entirely natural.

"I am sure, Miss Effingham, one who has seen as much of society as you, can scarcely ask that question seriously. I do not think I have done so improper a thing since I was fifteen; and—dear me!—dear me! how to escape is the question? You have permitted your partner to go, and I do not see a gentleman of my acquaintance near us to give me his arm!"

"As your distress is occasioned by my company," said Eve, "it is fortunately in my power to relieve it:" thus saying, she quietly walked across the room, and took her seat next to Mademoiselle Vieffville.

Miss Ring held up her hands in amazement, and then fortunately perceiving one of the truants gaping at no great distance, she beckoned him to her side.

"Have the extreme goodness to give me your arm, Mr. Summerfield," she said; "I am dying to get out of this unpleasantly conspicuous situation; but you are the first gentleman that has approached me this twelvemonth. I would not, for the world, do so brazen a thing as Miss Effingham has just achieved. Would you believe it? she positively went from this spot to her seat quite alone!"

"The Hajjis are privileged, and surprisingly bold."

"They make themselves so. But everybody knows how bold and unwomanly the French females are. One could wish, however, that our own people would not import their audacious ways into this country."

"'Tis a thousand pities that Mr. Clay, in his compromise, neglected to make an exception against that article. A tariff on impudence would not be at all sectional."

"It might interfere with the manufacture at home, notwithstanding," said John Effingham, for the lungs were strong, and the rooms of Mrs. Houston so small, that little was said that evening which was not heard by any who chose to listen. But Miss Ring never listened, it being no part of the vocation of a belle to perform that inferior office; and, sustained by the protecting arm of Mr. Summerfield, she advanced more boldly into the crowd, where she soon contrived to catch another group of even six "entertainees." As for Mr. Summerfield, he lived a twelvemonth on the reputation of the exceedingly clever thing he had just uttered.

"There come Ned and Aristobulus," said John Effingham, as soon as the tones of Miss Ring's voice were lost in the din of fifty others, pitched to the same key. "A présent, Mademoiselle, je vais nous venger."

As John Effingham uttered this, he took Captain Truck by the arm, and went to meet his cousin and the land-agent. The latter he soon separated from Mr. Effingham, and with this new recruit he managed to get so near Miss Ring as to attract her attention. Although fifty, John Effingham was known to be a bachelor, well connected, and to have seventeen thousand a year. In addition, he was well preserved and singularly handsome, besides having an air that set all pretending gentility at defiance. These were qualities that no belle despised, and ill assorted matches were, moreover, just coming into fashion in New York. Miss Ring had an intuitive knowledge that he wished to speak to her, and she was not slow in offering the opportunity. The superior tone of John Effingham, his caustic wit and his knowledge of the world, dispersed the five beaux incontinently; for these persons have a natural antipathy to any one of the qualities named.

"I hope you will permit me to presume on an acquaintance that extends back as far as your grandfather, Miss Ring," he said, "to present two very intimate friends, Mr. Bragg and Mr. Truck, gentlemen who will well reward the acquaintance."

The lady bowed graciously, for it was a matter of conscience with her to receive every man with a smile. She was still too much in awe of the master of ceremonies to open her batteries of attack, but John Effingham soon relieved her, by affecting a desire to speak to another lady. The belle had now the two strangers to herself, and having heard that the Effinghams had an Englishman of condition as a companion, who was travelling under a false name, she fancied herself very clever in detecting him at once in the person of Aristobulus; while, by the aid of a lively imagination, she thought Mr. Truck was his travelling Mentor, and, of course, a divine of the church of England. The incognito she was too well-bred to hint at, though she wished both the gentlemen to perceive that a belle was not to be mystified in this easy manner, like another person. Indeed, she was rather sensitive on the subject of her readiness in recognising a man of fashion under any circumstances, and, to let this be known was her very first object, as soon as she was relieved from the presence of John Effingham.

“You must be struck with the unsophisticated nature, and the extreme simplicity of our society, Mr. Bragg,” she said, looking at him significantly; “we are very conscious it is not what it might be, but do you not think it pretty well for beginners?”

Now Mr. Bragg had an entire consciousness that before this very night he had never seen any society that deserved the name, but he was supported in giving his opinions by that secret sense of his qualifications to fill any station which formed so conspicuous a trait in his character, and his answer was given with an à plomb that would have added weight to the opinion of the veriest élégant of the Chaussée d’Antin.

“It is indeed a good deal unsophisticated,” he said, “and so simple that anybody can understand it. I find but a single fault with this entertainment, which is, in all else, the perfection of elegance in my eyes; and that is that there is too little room to swing the legs in dancing.”

“Indeed! — I did not expect that — is it not the best usage of Europe, now, to bring a quadrille into the very minimum of space?”

“Quite the contrary, Miss. All good dancing requires evolutions. The dancing Dervishes, for instance, would occupy quite as much space as both of these sets that are walking before us; and I believe it is generally admitted now, that all good dancing needs room for the legs, as a sine qua non.”

“We necessarily get a little behind the fashions in this distant country. Pray, sir, is it usual for ladies to walk alone in society?”

"Woman was not made to move in life alone, Miss," returned Aristobulus, with a sentimental glance of the eye; for he never let a good opportunity for preferment slip through his fingers, and failing of Miss Effingham, or Miss Van Courtlandt, of whose estates and connexions, he had some pretty accurate notions, it struck him Miss Ring might possibly be a very eligible connexion, as all was grist that came to his mill: "this, I believe, is an admitted truth."

"By life, you mean matrimony, I suppose?"

"Yes, Miss; a man always means matrimony when he speaks to a young lady."

This rather disconcerted Miss Ring, who began to pick her nosegay, for she was not accustomed to hear gentlemen talk to ladies of matrimony, but only ladies to talk to gentlemen. Recovering her self-possession, however, she said with a promptitude that did infinite credit to the school to which she belonged,—

"You speak, sir, like one having experience."

"Certainly, Miss, I have been in love ever since I was ten years old; I may say I was born in love, and I hope to die in love."

This a little out-heroded Herod, but the belle was not a person to be easily daunted on such a subject: she smiled graciously, therefore, and continued the conversation with renewed spirit.

"You travelled gentlemen get odd notions," she said, "and more particularly on such subjects. I always feel afraid to discuss them with foreigners, though with my own countrymen I have few reserves. Pray, Mr. Truck, are you satisfied with America?—Do you find it the country you expected to see?"

"Certainly, marm," for so they pronounced this word in the river when the captain received his first impressions: "when we sailed from Portsmouth, I expected the first land we should make would be the Highlands of Navesink, and, although I was a little disappointed, I have had the satisfaction of laying eyes on it at last."

"Disappointment, I fear, is the usual fate of those who come from the other side.—Is this dwelling of Mrs. Houston's equal to the residence of an English nobleman, Mr. Bragg?"

"Considerably better, Miss; especially in the way of republican comfort."

Miss Ring, like all belles, detested the word republican, their vocation being clearly to exclusiveness, and she pouted a little affectedly.

"I should distrust the quality of such comfort, sir," she said, with point: "but are the rooms at all comparable with the rooms in Apsley House, for instance?"

“My dear Miss, Apsley House is a tollgate cabin, compared to this mansion! I doubt if there be a dwelling in all England half so magnificent—indeed, I cannot imagine any thing more brilliant and rich.”

Aristobulus was not a man to do things by halves, and it was a point of honour with him to know something of everything. It is true, he knew no more where Apsley House was, or whether it was a tavern, or a gaol, than half the other things on which he delivered oracular opinions; but when it became necessary to speak, he was not apt to balk conversation from any ignorance, real or affected. The opinion he had just given, it is true, had a little surpassed Miss Ring's hopes, for the next thing in her ambition to being a belle, and “entertaining” gentlemen, was to fancy she was running her brilliant career in an orbit of fashion that lay parallel to that of the “nobility and gentry” of Great Britain.

“Well, this surpasses my hopes,” she said; “although I am aware we are not much below the level of the more improved tastes of Europe, still, I thought we were yet a little inferior to that part of the world.”

“Inferior, Miss! That is a word that should never pass your lips; you are inferior to nothing, whether in Europe or America, Africa or Asia.”

As Miss Ring had been accustomed to do most of the flattery herself, as behoveth a belle, she began to be disconcerted with the directness of the compliments of Aristobulus, who was disposed to “make hay while the sun shines,” and she turned, in a little confusion, to the captain by way of relief; we say confusion, for the young lady, though so liable to be misunderstood, was not actually impudent, but merely deceived in the relations of things; or, in other words, by some confusion in usages, she had hitherto permitted herself to do that in society which female performers sometimes do on the stage—enact the part of a man.

“You should tell Mr. Bragg, sir,” she said, with an appealing look at the captain, “that flattery is a dangerous vice, and one altogether unsuited to a Christian.”

“It is indeed, marm, and one I never indulge in. No one under my orders can ever accuse me of flattery.”

By “under orders,” Miss Ring understood curates and deacons, for she was aware that the Church of England had clerical distinctions of this sort that are unknown in America.

“I hope, sir, you do not intend to quit this country without favouring us with a discourse?”

“Not I, marm—I am discoursing pretty much from morning till night when among my own people, though I own that this conversationony rather puts me out of my reckoning. Let me get my foot on the planks I love, with an attentive audience, and a good segar in my mouth, and I'll hold forth with any bishop in the universe."

"A segar!" exclaimed Miss Ring, in surprise. "Do gentlemen of your profession use segars when performing the offices?"

"Does a parson take his fees? Why, Miss, there is not a man among us who does not smoke from morning till night."

"Surely not on Sundays!"

"Two for one on those days, more than on any other."

"And your people, sir, what do they do, all this time?"

"Why, marm, most of them chew, and those that don't, if they cannot find a pipe, have a dull time of it. For my part, I shall hardly relish the good place itself, if segars are prohibited."

Miss Ring was surprised, but she had heard that the English clergy were more free than our own, and then she had been accustomed to think everything English of the purest water. A little reflection reconciled her to the innovation, and the next day, at a dinner party, she was heard defending the usage as a practice that had a precedent in the ancient incense of the altar. At the moment, however, she was dying to impart her discoveries to others, and she kindly proposed to the captain and Aristobulus to introduce them to some of her acquaintances, as they might find it dull, being strangers, not to know any one. Introductions and segars were the captain's hobbies, and he accepted the offer with joy; Aristobulus uniting cordially in the proposition, as he fancied he had a right, under the constitution of the United States of America, to be introduced to every human being with whom he came in contact.

It is scarcely necessary to say how much the party, with whom the two neophytes in fashion had come, enjoyed all this, though they concealed their amusement under the calm exterior of people of the world. From Mr. Effingham the mystification was carefully concealed by his cousin, as the former would have felt it due to Mrs. Houston, a well-meaning but silly woman, to put an end to it. Eve and Grace laughed, as merry girls would be apt to laugh, at such an occurrence, and they danced the remainder of the evening with lighter hearts than ever. At one, the company retired in the same informal manner, as respects announcements and the calling of carriages, as that in which they had entered; most, to lay their drowsy heads on their pillows, and Miss Ring to ponder over the superior manners of a polished young Englishman, and to dream of a sermon that was preserved in tobacco.

CHAPTER VI.

Marry, our play is the most lamentable comedy and most cruel death of Pyramus and Thisby.
Peter Quince.

Our task in the way of describing town society will soon be ended. The gentlemen of the Effingham family had been invited to meet Sir George Templemore at one or two dinners, to which the latter had been invited in consequence of his letters, most of which were connected with his arrangements. As one of these entertainments was like all the rest of the same character, a very brief account of it will suffice to let the reader into the secret of their excellence.

A well-spread board, excellent viands, highly respectable cookery, and delicious wines, were met with everywhere. Two rows of men clad in dark dresses, a solitary female at the head of the table, or, if fortunate, with a supporter of the same sex near her, invariably composed the convives. The exaggerations of a province were ludicrously apparent in one particular custom. The host, or perhaps it might have been the hostess, had been told that there should be a contrast between the commoner light of the reception room and the brilliancy of the table; and John Effingham actually broke his legs against a stool, in floundering through the obscurity of the first drawing-room he entered on such an occasion.

When seated at table, the first great duty of restoration performed, the conversation turned on the prices of lots, speculations in towns, or the currency. After this came the regular assay of wines, during which it was easy to fancy the master of the house a dealer, for he was usually either sucking a syphon, or flourishing a cork-screw. The discourse would now have done credit to the annual meeting and convivial dinner of the German exporters, assembled at Rudesheim to bid for the article.

Sir George was certainly on the point of forming a very erroneous judgment concerning the country when Mr. Effingham extricated him from this set, and introduced him properly to his own. Here, indeed, though there was much to strike an European as peculiar, and even provincial, the young baronet fared much better. He met with the same fare, relieved by an intelligence that was always respectable, and a tone of manners which, if not unmixed, had the great merit of simplicity and nature that are not found in more sophisticated circles. The occasional incongruities struck them all more than the positive general faults, and Sir George Templemore did justice to the truth, by admitting frankly the danger he had been in of forming a too hasty opinion.

During this time, which occupied a month, the young baronet's intimacy in State Street was increasing; Eve gradually becoming more frank and unreserved with him, as she grew sensible that he had abandoned his hopes of success with herself; and Grace as gradually more cautious and timid, as she became conscious of his power to please, and of the interest he took in herself.

It might have been three days after the ball at Mrs. Houston's that the State Street family was engaged to look in on a Mrs. Legend, a lady of what was called a literary turn, Sir George having been asked to make one of their party. Aristobulus was already returned to his duty in the country, where we shall shortly have occasion to join him; but an invitation had been sent to Mr. Truck, under the erroneous impression of his real character.

Taste, whether in the arts, literature, or any thing else, is a natural impulse, like love. It is true, both may be cultivated and heightened by circumstances, but the impulses must be voluntary; and the flow of feeling, or of soul, as it has become a law to style it, is not to be forced, or commanded to come and go at will. This is the reason that all premeditated enjoyments, connected with the intellect, are apt to disappoint expectations; and why academies, literary clubs, coteries, and dinners are commonly dull. It is true that a body of clever people may be brought together, and if left to their own impulses the character of their minds will show itself; wit will flash, and thought will answer thought spontaneously; but every effort to make the stupid agreeable, by giving a direction of a pretending intellectual nature to their efforts, is only rendering dulness more conspicuous by exhibiting it in contrast to what it ought to be to be clever; as a bad picture is rendered the more conspicuous by an elaborate and gorgeous frame. The latter was the fate of most of Mrs. Legend's literary evenings, at which it was thought a distinction to understand even one foreign language. But it was known that Eve was skilled in most of the European tongues; and the good lady, not feeling that such accomplishments are chiefly useful as a means, looked about her in order to collect a set, among whom our heroine might find some one to converse with in each of the dialects with which she was familiar. Little was said about it, it is true, but great efforts were made to cause this evening to be memorable in the annals of conversazioni; or, as the honest captain called them, conversationonys.

In carrying out this scheme nearly all the wits, writers, artists, and litterati, as the most incorrigible members of the book clubs were styled in New York, were pressingly invited to be present. Aristobulus had contrived to earn such a reputation for the baronet on the night of the ball, that he was universally called a man of letters, and an article had actually appeared in one of the papers, speaking of the "Hon and Rev. Mr. Truck, a gentleman travelling in our country, from whose liberality and just views an account of our society was to be expected, that should, at last, do justice to the national character." With such expectations, then, every true American and Americaness was expected to be at his or her post for the solemn occasion. It was a rally of literature in defence of the institutions—no, not the institutions, for they were left to take care of themselves—but of the vanity of the community.

Alas! it is easier to feel high aspirations on such subjects, than to succeed in a provincial town; for merely calling a place an Emporium is very far from giving it the independence, high tone, condensed intelligence, and tastes of a capital. Poor Mrs. Legend, desirous of having all the tongues duly represented, was obliged to invite certain dealers in gin from Holland, a German linen merchant from Saxony, an Italian dei cavalieri who amused himself in selling beads, and a Spanish master, who was born in Portugal, all of whom had just one requisite for conversation in their respective languages, and no more. But such assemblies were convened in Paris, and why not in New York?

We shall not dwell upon the awful sensations with which Mrs. Legend heard the first ring at her door on the eventful night in question. It was the precursor of the entrance of Miss Annual, as regular a devotee of letters as ever conned a primer. The meeting was sentimental and affectionate. Before either had time, however, to disburthen her mind of one half of its prepared phrases, ring upon ring proclaimed more company, and the room was soon as much sprinkled with talent as a modern novel with jests. Among those who came first appeared all the foreign corps, for the refreshments entered as something into the account with them; and every blue of the place, whose social position in the least entitled her to be seen in such a house, Mrs. Legend belonging decidedly to good society.

The scene that succeeded was very characteristic. A professed genius does nothing like other people, except in cases that require a particular display of talent. In all minor matters he or she is sui generis, for sentiment is in constant ebullition in their souls; this being what is commonly meant by the flow of that part of the human system.

We might here very well adopt the Homeric method, and call the roll of heroes and heroines in what the French would term a catalogue raisonné; but our limits compel us to be less ambitious, and to adopt a simpler mode of communicating facts. Among the ladies who now figured in the drawing-room of Mrs. Legend, in addition to Miss Annual, were Miss Mouthly, Mrs. Economy, S. R. P., Marion, Longinus, Julietta, Herodotus, D. O. V. E., and Mrs. Demonstration; besides many others of less note, together with at least a dozen female Hajjis, whose claims to appear in such society were pretty much dependent on the fact that, having seen pictures and statues abroad, they necessarily must have the means of talking about them at home. The list of men was still more formidable in numbers, if not in talent. At its head stood Steadfast Dodge, Esquire, whose fame as a male Hajji had so far swollen since Mrs. Jarvis' réunion, that, for the first time in his life, he now entered one of the better houses of his own country. Then there were the authors of "Lapis Lazuli;" "The Aunts;" "The Reformed;" "The Conformed;" "The Transformed;" and "The Deformed;" with the editors of "The Hebdomad;" "The Night Cap;" "The Chrysalis;" "The Real Maggot;" and "The Seek no Further;" also, "Junius;" "Junius Brutus;" "Lucius Junius Brutus;" "Capt. Kant;" "Florio;" the author of the "History of Billy Linkum Tweedle, the celebrated Pottawattamie Prophet;" "Single Rhyme," a genius who had prudently rested his fame in verse on a couplet composed of one line; with divers amateurs and connaisseurs, Hajjis, who must be men of talent, as they had acquired all they knew very much as American Eclipse gained his laurels on the turf; that is to say, by a free use of the whip and spur.

As Mrs. Legend sailed about her rooms, amid such a circle, her mind expanded, her thoughts diffused themselves among her guests, on the principle of animal magnetism, and her heart was melting with the tender sympathies of congenial tastes. She felt herself to be at the head of American talent, and in the secret recesses of her reason she determined that, did even the fate of Sodom and Gomorrah menace her native town, as some evil-disposed persons had dared to insinuate might one day be the case, here was enough to save it from destruction!

It was just as the mistress of the mansion had come to this consoling conclusion, that the State Street party rang. As few of her guests came in carriages, Mrs. Legend, who had heard the rolling of wheels, felt persuaded that the Lion of the night was now indeed at hand; and, with a view to a proper reception, she requested the company to divide itself into two lines, in order that he might enter, as it were, between lanes of genius.

It may be necessary to explain, at this point of our narrative, that John Effingham was perfectly aware of the error which existed in relation to the real character of Captain Truck, wherein he thought great injustice had been done the honest seaman; and, the old man intending to sail for London next morning, he had persuaded him to accept this invitation, in order that the public might be disabused in a matter of so much importance. With a view that this might be done naturally and without fuss, however, he did not explain the mistake to his nautical friend, believing it most probable this could be done better incidentally, as it were, in the course of the evening, and feeling certain of that wholesome apophthegm, which says that "truth is powerful, and must prevail." "If this be so," added John Effingham in his explanations to Eve, "there can be no place where the sacred quality will be so likely to assert itself as in a galaxy of geniuses, whose distinctive characteristic is an intuitive perception of all things in their real colours."

When the door of Mrs. Legend's drawing-room opened in the usual noiseless manner, Mademoiselle Vieffville, who led the way, was startled at finding herself in the very situation of one who is condemned to "run the gauntlet." Fortunately, she caught a glimpse of Mrs. Legend, posted at the other end of the proud array, inviting her, with smiles, to approach. The invitation had been to a "literary fête," and Mademoiselle Vieffville was too much of a Frenchwoman to be totally disconcerted at a little scenic effect on the occasion of a fête of any sort. Supposing she was now a witness of an American ceremony for the first time, for the want of a représentation in the country had been rather a subject of animadversion with her, she advanced steadily towards the mistress of the house, bestowing smile for smile, this being a part of the programme at which a Parisienne was not easily out-done. Eve followed, as usual, sola; Grace came next; then Sir George; then John Effingham; the captain bringing up the rear. There had been a friendly contest for precedence between the two last, each desiring to yield it to the other on the score of merit; but the captain prevailed by declaring "that he was navigating an unknown sea, and that he could do nothing wiser than to sail in the wake of so good a pilot as Mr. John Effingham."

As Hajjis of approved experience, the persons who led the advance in this little procession were subjects of proper attention and respect; but as the admiration of mere vulgar travelling would in itself be vulgar, care was taken to reserve the condensed feeling of the company for the celebrated English writer and wit, who was known to bring up the rear. This was not a common house, in which dollars had place and belles rioted, but the Temple of Genius, and every one felt a veneration for the abilities of the established foreign writer, that was in exact proportion to their indifference to the seventeen thousand a year of John Effingham, and to the nearly equal amount of Eve's expectations.

The personal appearance of the honest tar was well adapted to the character he was thus called so unexpectedly to support. His hair had long been getting grey, but the intense anxiety resulting from the chase, the wreck and his other recent adventures, had gradually but rapidly increased this mark of time; and his head was now nearly as white as snow. The hale, fresh, red of his features, which was in truth the result of exposure, might very well pass for the tint of port; and his tread, which had always a little of the quarter deck swing about it, might quite easily be mistaken by a tyro for the human frame staggering under a load of learning. Unfortunately for those who dislike mystifications, the captain had consulted John Effingham upon the subject of the toilette, and that kind and indulgent friend had suggested the propriety of appearing in black smallclothes for the occasion—a costume that he often wore himself of an evening. Reality, in this instance then, did not disappoint expectation, and the burst of applause with which the captain was received was accompanied by a general murmur in commendation of the admirable manner in which he “looked the character.”

“What a Byronic head!” whispered the author of “The Transformed” to D. O. V. E.; “and was there ever such a curl of the lip, before, in mortal man!”

The truth is, the captain had thrust his tobacco into “an aside,” as a monkey is known to empocher a spare nut, or a lump of sugar.

“Do you think him Byronic?—To my eye, the cast of his head is Shakspearian rather, though I confess there is a little of Milton about the forehead!”

“Pray,” said Miss Annual to Lucius Junius Brutus, “which is thought to be the best of his works; that on a—a—a—, or that on—e—e—e?”

Now, so it happened, that not a soul in the room, but the lion himself, had any idea what books he had written, and he only knew of some fifteen or twenty log-books. All that was generally understood was the fact that he was a great English writer, and this was more than sufficient.

“I believe the world generally prefers the—a—a—a,”—said Lucius Junius Brutus, “but the few give a decided preference to the—e—e—e.”

“Oh! out of all question preferable!” exclaimed half a dozen within hearing.

“With what a classical modesty he pays his compliments to Mrs. Legend," observed S. R. P. "One can always tell a man of real genius by his tenue."

"He is so English!" cried Florio. "Ah! they are the only people after all!"

This Florio was one of those geniuses who sigh most for the things they least possess.

By this time Captain Truck had got through the task of listening to the compliments of Mrs. Legend, when he was seized upon by a circle of rabid literati who badgered him with questions concerning his opinions, notions, inferences, experiences, associations, sensations, sentiments, and intentions, in a way that soon threw the old man into a profuse perspiration. Fifty times did he wish, from the bottom of his soul—that soul which the crowd around him fancied dwelt so high in the clouds—that he was seated quietly by the side of Mrs. Hawker, who, he mentally swore, was worth all the literati in Christendom. But fate had decreed otherwise, and we shall leave him to his fortune for a time, and return to our heroine and her party.

As soon as Mrs. Legend had got through her introductory compliments to the captain, she sought Eve and Grace, with a consciousness that a few civilities were now their due.

"I fear, Miss Effingham, after the elaborate soirées of the literary circles in Paris, you will find our réunions of the same sort a little dull; and yet I flatter myself with having assembled most of the talent of New York on this memorable occasion, to do honour to your friend. Are you acquainted with many of the company?"

Now, Eve had never before this night seen, or even heard of, a single being in the room, with the exception of Mr. Dodge and her own party, although most of them had been so laboriously employed in puffing each other into celebrity for many weary years; and, as for elaborate soirées, she thought she had never seen any half so elaborate as this of Mrs. Legend. As, however, it would not very well do to express all this in words, she civilly desired the lady to point out to her some of the most distinguished of the company, in order that she might know their persons at least.

"With the greatest pleasure, Miss Effingham," said Mrs. Legend, who took pride in dwelling on the merits of her guests.—"This heavy, grand-looking personage, in whose air one sees at a glance intellectual refinement and unequalled modesty, is Captain Kant, the editor of one of our most decidedly pious newspapers. His mind is remarkable for its intuitive perception of all that is delicate, reserved, and finished in the intellectual world, while, in opposition to this quality, which is almost feminine, his character is just as remarkable for its unflinching love of truth. He was never known to publish a falsehood, and of his foreign correspondence, in particular, he is so exceedingly careful, that he assures me he has every word of it written under his own eye."

"On the subject of his religious scruples," added John Effingham, "he is so fastidiously exact, that I hear he 'says grace' over everything that goes from his press, and 'returns thanks' for everything that comes to it."

"You know him, Mr. Effingham, by this remark. Is he not, truly, a man of a vocation?"

"That, indeed, he is, ma'am. He may be succinctly said to have a newspaper mind, as he reduces everything in nature or art to news, and commonly imparts to it so much of his own peculiar character that it loses all identity with the subjects to which it originally belonged. One scarcely knows which to admire most in this man, the atmospheric transparency of his motives, (for he is so disinterested as seldom even to think of paying for a dinner when travelling, and yet so conscientious as always to say something obliging of the tavern as soon as he gets home,) his rigid regard to facts, or the exquisite refinement and delicacy that he imparts to everything he touches. Over all this, too, he throws a beautiful halo of morality and religion, never even prevaricating in the hottest discussion, unless with the unction of a saint."

"Do you happen to know Florio?" asked Mrs. Legend, a little distrusting John Effingham's account of Captain Kant.

"If I do, it must indeed be by accident. What are his chief characteristics, ma'am?"

"Sentiment, pathos, delicacy, and all in rhyme too. You no doubt have heard of his triumph over Lord Byron, Miss Effingham?"

Eve was obliged to confess that it was new to her.

"Why, Byron wrote an ode to Greece, commencing with 'The isles of Greece! The isles of Greece!' a very feeble line, as any one will see, for it contained a useless and an unmeaning repetition."

"And you might add vulgar, too, Mrs. Legend," said John Effingham, "since it made a palpable allusion to all those vulgar incidents that associate themselves in the mind with these said common-place isles. The arts, philosophy, poetry, eloquence, and even old Homer is brought unpleasantly to one's recollection by such an indiscreet invocation."

"So Florio thought, and, by way of letting the world perceive the essential difference between the base and the pure coin, he wrote an ode on England which commenced as such an ode should."

"Do you happen to recollect any of it, ma'am?"

"Only the first line, which I greatly regret, as the rhyme is Florio's chief merit. But this line is, of itself, sufficient to immortalize a man."

"Do not keep us in torment, dear Mrs. Legend, but let us have the line for heaven's sake."

"It began in this sublime strain, sir—'Beyond the wave! Beyond the wave!' Now, Miss Effingham, that is what I call poetry!"

"And well you may, ma'am," returned the gentleman, who perceived Eve could scarcely refrain from breaking out in a very unsentimental manner—"so much pathos!"

"And so sententious and flowing!"

"Condensing a journey of three thousand miles, as it might be, into three words and a note of admiration. I trust it was printed with a note of admiration, Mrs. Legend?"

"Yes, sir, with two—one behind each wave—and such waves, Mr. Effingham!"

"Indeed, ma'am, you may say so. One really gets a grand idea of them, England lying beyond each."

"So much expressed in so few syllables!"

"I think I see every shoal, current, ripple, rock, island, and whale, between Sandy Hook and the Land's End."

"He hints at an epic."

"Pray Heaven, he may execute one. Let him make haste too, or he may get behind the age! behind the age!"

Here the lady was called away to receive a guest.

"Cousin Jack!"

"Eve Effingham!"

"Do you not sometimes fear offending?"

"Not a woman who begins by expressing her admiration of such a sublime thing as this. You are safe with such a person anywhere, short of a tweak of the nose."

"Mais tout ceci est bien drôle!"

"You never were more mistaken in your life, Mademoiselle; everybody here, but yourself, looks upon it as a matter of life and death."

The new guest was Mr. Pindar, one of those careless, unsentimental fellows that occasionally throw off an ode that passes through Christendom, as dollars are known to pass from China to Norway, and yet who never fancied spectacles necessary to his appearance, solemnity to his face, nor soirées to his renown. After quitting Mrs. Legend, he approached Eve, to whom he was slightly known, and saluted her.

"This is the region of taste, Miss Effingham," he said, with a shrug of the jaw, if such a member can shrug. "And I do not wonder at finding you here."

He then chatted pleasantly for a moment with the party, and passed on, giving an ominous gape as he drew near to the oi polloi of literature. A moment after appeared Mr. Gray, a man who needed nothing but taste in the public, and the encouragement that would follow such a taste, to stand at, or certainly near, the head of the poets of our own time. He, too, looked fearfully at the galaxy, and took refuge in a corner. Mr. Pith followed; he was a man whose caustic wit needs only a sphere for its exercise, manners to portray, and a society with strong points about it to illustrate, in order to enrol his name high in the catalogue of satirists. Another ring announced Mr. Fun, a writer of exquisite humour and of finished periods, but who, having perpetrated a little too much sentiment in his time, was instantly seized upon by all the ultra ladies in that way in the room.

These persons came late, like those who had already been too often dosed in the same way to be impatient of repetitions. The three soon got together in a corner, and Eve fancied they were laughing at the rest of the company, whereas, in fact, they were merely laughing at a bad joke of their own; their quick perception of the ludicrous having pointed out a hundred odd combinations and absurdities that would have escaped duller minds.

“Who, in the name of the twelve Cæsars, has Mrs. Legend got to lionize yonder, with the white summit and the dark base?” asked the odeist.

“Some English pamphleteer, by what I can learn,” answered he of satire—“some fellow that has achieved a pert review, or written a Minerva Pressism, and who now flourishes among us like a green bay tree. A modern Horace, or a Juvenal, on his travels.”

“Fun is well badgered,” observed Mr. Gray—“Do you not see Miss Annual, Miss Mouthly, and that young alphabet D. O. V. E. have got him within the circle of their petticoats, where he will be martyred on a sigh?”

“He casts very longing looks this way; he wishes you to go to his rescue, Pith.”

“I!—let him take his fill of sentiment. I am no homopathist in such matters. Large doses in quick succession will soonest work a cure. Here comes the lion, and he breaks loose from his cage like a beast that has been poked up with sticks.”

“Good evening, gentlemen,” said Captain Truck, wiping his face intensely, and who, having made his escape from a throng of admirers, took refuge in the first port that offered. “You seem to be enjoying yourselves here in a rational and agreeable way. Quite cool and refreshing, in this corner, as I hope to be saved.”

“And yet we have no doubt that both our reason and our enjoyment will receive a large increase from the addition of your society, sir," returned Mr. Pith. "Do us the favour to take a seat, I beg of you, and to rest yourself."

"With all my heart, gentlemen; for, to own the truth, these ladies make warm work about a stranger. I have just got out of what I call a category."

"You appear to have escaped with life, sir," observed Pindar, taking a cool survey of the other's person—"which is more than happens to every lion that is caged."

"Yes, thank God, I have done that; and it is pretty much all I have done," answered the captain, wiping his face. "I served in the French war—Truxton's war as we call it—and I had a touch with the English in the privateer trade between twelve and fifteen, and here quite lately I was in an encounter with the savage Arabs down on the coast of Africa, and I account them all as so much snow-balling compared with the yard-arm-and-yard-arm work of this very night. I wonder if it is permitted to try a segar at these conversationonys, gentlemen?"

"I believe it is, sir," returned Pindar, coolly; "shall I help you to a light?"

"Oh, Mr. Truck!" cried Mrs. Legend, following the chafed animal to his corner, as one would pursue any other runaway, "instinct has brought you into this good company. You are now in the very focus of American talent."

"Having just escaped from the focus of American talons," whispered Pith.

"I must be permitted to introduce you myself. Mr. Truck, Mr. Pindar—Mr. Pith, Mr. Gray—gentlemen, you must be so happy as to be acquainted, being, as it were, engaged in the same pursuit!"

The captain rose and shook each of the gentlemen cordially by the hand, for he had, at least, the consolation of a great many introductions that night. Mrs. Legend disappeared to say something clever to some other prodigy.

"Happy to meet you, gentlemen," said the captain. "In what trade do you sail?"

"By whatever name we may call it," answered Mr. Pindar—"we can scarcely be said to go before the wind."

"Not in the Ingee business, then; or the moonsoons would keep the stun'-sails set, at least."

"No, sir,—but yonder is Mr. Moccasin, who has lately set up, secundem artem, in the Indian business, having already written two novels in that way, and begun a third."

"Are you all regularly employed, gentlemen?"

"As regularly as inspiration permits," said Mr. Pith. "Men of our occupation must make fair weather of it, or had better be doing nothing."

"So I often tell my owners, but go ahead is the order of the day. When I was a youngster, a ship remained in port for a fair wind, but now she goes to work and makes one. The world seems to get young as I get old."

"This is a rum litterateur, Gray," whispered Pindar.

"It is an obvious mystification,"—was the answer: "poor Mrs. Legend has picked up some straggling porpoise, and converted him, by a touch of her magical wand, into a Boanerges of literature. The thing is as clear as day, for the worthy fellow smells of tar and segar-smoke. I perceive that Mr. Effingham is laughing out of the corner of his eyes; so I will step across the room, and get at the truth in a minute."

The odeist was as good as his word, and was soon back again, when he contrived to let his friends understand the real state of the case. A knowledge of the captain's true character encouraged this trio in the benevolent wish of aiding the old seaman in his desire to smoke, and Mr. Pith managed to give him a lighted paper without becoming an open accessory to the plot.

"Will you take a segar yourself, sir?" said the captain, offering his box to Mr. Pindar.

"I thank you, Mr. Truck; I never smoke, but am a profound admirer of the flavour. Let me entreat you to begin as soon as possible."

Thus encouraged, Captain Truck drew two or three whiffs, when the rooms were immediately filled with the fragrance of a real Havanna. At the first discovery, the whole literary pack went off on the scent. As for Mr. Fun, he managed to profit by the agitation that followed, in order to escape to the three wags in the corner, who were enjoying the scene with the gravity of so many dervishes.

"As I live," cried Lucius Junius Brutus, "there is the author of—a—a—a—actually smoking a segar!—How excessively piquant!"

"Do my eyes deceive me, or is not that the writer of—e—e—e—fumigating us all?" whispered Miss Annual.

"Nay, this cannot certainly be right," said Florio, with a dogmatical sentiment in his manner. "All the periodicals agree that smoking is ungenteel in old England."

"You never were more mistaken, dear Florio," replied D. O. V. E. in a cooing tone; "the very last novel of society has a chapter in which the hero and heroine smoke in the declaration scene."

"Do they, indeed!—That alters the case. Really one would not wish to get behind so great a nation, nor yet go much before it. Pray, Captain Kant, what do your friends in Canada say; is, or is not smoking permitted in good society there? The Canadians must, at least, be ahead of us."

"Not at all, sir," said the editor in his softest tones; "it is revolutionary and jacobinical."

But the ladies prevailed, and, by a process rather peculiar to what may be called a "credulous" state of society, they carried the day. This process was simply to make one fiction authority for another. The fact that smoking was carried so far in England, that the clergy actually used segars in the pulpit, was affirmed on the authority of Mr. Truck himself, and, coupled with his present occupation, the point was deemed to be settled. Even Florio yielded, and his plastic mind soon saw a thousand beauties in the usage that had hitherto escaped it. All the literati drew round the captain in a circle, to enjoy the spectacle, though the honest old mariner contrived to throw out such volumes of vapour as to keep them at a safe distance. His four demure-looking neighbours got behind the barrier of smoke, where they deemed themselves entrenched against the assaults of petticoats for a time at least.

"Pray, Mr. Truck," inquired S. R. P. "is it commonly thought in the English literary circles, that Byron was a development of Shakspeare, or Shakspeare a shadowing forth of Byron?"

"Both, marm," said the captain, with a coolness that would have done credit to Aristobulus, for he had been fairly badgered into impudence; and, profiting by the occasion to knock the ashes off his segar, he added "all incline to the first opinion, and some to the last."

"What finesse!"—murmured one. "How delicate!" whispered a second. "A dignified reserve!" ejaculated a third. "So English!" exclaimed Florio.

"Do you think, Mr. Truck," asked D. O. V. E., "that the profane songs of Little have more pathos than the sacred songs of Moore, or that the sacred songs of Moore have more sentiment than the profane songs of Little?"

"A little of both, marm, and something to spare. I think there is little in one, and more in the other."

"Pray, sir," said S. R. P. "do you pronounce the name of Byron's lady-love Guy - kee - oh - ly, or Gwy - ky - o - lee?"

"That depends upon how the wind is. If, on shore, I commonly say "oh!—lee!" and if off shore, oh—ly."

"That's capital!" cried Florio, in an ecstasy of admiration. "What man in this country could have said so crack a thing as that?"

“Indeed it is very witty,” added Miss Mouthly,—“what does it mean?”

“Mean! more than is seen or felt by common minds. Ah! the English are, truly, a great nation!—How delightfully he smokes!”

“I think he is much the most interesting man we have had out here,” observed Miss Annual, “since the last bust of Scott!”

“Ask him, dear D. O. V. E.,” whispered Julietta, who was timid from the circumstance of never having published, “which he thinks the most ecstatic feeling, hope or despair?”

The question was put by the more experienced lady, according to request, though she first said in a hurried tone, to her youthful sister,—“You can have felt but little, child, or you would know that it is despair, as a matter of course.”

The honest captain, however, did not treat the matter so lightly, for he improved the opportunity to light a fresh segar, throwing the still smoking stump into Mrs. Legend’s grate, through a lane of literati, as he afterwards boasted, as coolly as he could have thrown it overboard under other circumstances. Luckily for his reputation for sentiment he mistook “ecstatic,” a word he had never heard before, for “erratic,” and recollecting sundry roving maniacs that he had seen, he answered promptly—

“I knew it,” said one.

“It’s in nature,” added a second.

“All can feel its truth,” rejoined a third.

“This point may now be set down as established,” cried Florio, “and I hope no more will be said about it.”

“This is encouragement to the searchers after truth,” remarked Captain Kant.

“Pray, Hon. and Rev. Mr. Truck,” asked Lucius Junius Brutus, at the joint suggestion of Junius Brutus and Brutus, “does the Princess Victoria smoke?”

“If she did not, sir, what would be the use in being a princess? I suppose you know that all the tobacco seized in England, after a deduction to informers, goes to the crown.”

“I object to this usage,” remarked Captain Kant, “as irreligious, French, and tending to sans culotteism. I am willing to admit this distinguished instance as an exception, but on all other grounds I shall maintain that it savours of infidelity to smoke. The Prussian government, much the best of our times, never smokes.”

“This man thinks he has a monopoly of the puffing himself,” whispered Pindar into the captain’s ear; “but whiff away, my dear sir, and you will soon throw him into the shade.”

The captain winked, drew out his box, lighted another segar, and by way of reply to the envious remark, he put one in each corner of his mouth, and soon had both in full blast, a state in which he kept them for nearly a minute.

“This is the very picturesque of social enjoyment!” exclaimed Florio, holding up both hands in a glow of rapture. “It is absolutely Homeric in the way of usages! Ah, the English are a very great nation!”

“I should like to know excessively if there was really such a person as Baron Mun-chaw-sun?” said Julietta, gathering courage from the success of her last question.

“There was, miss,” returned the captain through his teeth, and nodding his head in the affirmative. “A regular traveller, that; and one who knew him well, swore to me that he hadn’t related one half of what befel him.”

“How very delightful to learn this from the highest quarter!” exclaimed Miss Mouthly.

“Is Gatty (Goethe) really dead?” inquired Longinus; “or is the account we have had to that effect merely a metaphysical apotheosis of his mighty soul?”

“Dead, marm—stone dead—dead as a door nail,” returned the captain, who saw a present relief in killing as many as possible, even if they came to life again hereafter.

“You have been in France, Mr. Truck, beyond question?” said Lucius Junius Brutus, in the way one puts a question.

“France! I was in France before I was ten years old. I know every foot of it, from Havre de Grace to Marseilles.”

“Will you have the goodness to explain to us whether the soul of Chat-to-bri-ong is more expanded than his reason, or his reason more expanded than his soul?”

Captain Truck had a very tolerable notion of Baron Munchausen, and of his particular merits, but Châteaubriand was a writer of whom he knew nothing. After pausing a moment, and feeling persuaded that a confession of ignorance might undo him, for the old man began to be influenced by the atmosphere of the place, he answered coolly:—

“Oh! Chat-to-bri-ong is it you mean! As whole soul a fellow as I know. All soul, sir, and lots of reason besides.”

“How simple and unaffected!”

“Crack!” exclaimed Florio.

“A thorough Jacobin!” growled Captain Kant, who was always offended when any one but himself took liberties with the truth.

Here the four wags in the corner observed that head went to head in the crowd, and that the rear rank of the company began to disappear, while Mrs. Legend was in evident distress. In a few minutes all the Romans were off; Florio soon after vanished, grating his teeth in a poetical frenzy, and even Captain Kant, albeit roused to look truth in the face, beat a retreat. The alphabet followed, and even the Annual and the Mouthly retired, with leave-takings so solemn and precise, that poor Mrs. Legend was in total despair.

Eve, foreseeing something unpleasant, had gone away first, and in a few minutes Mr. Dodge, who had been very active in the crowd, whispering and gesticulating, made his bow also. The envy of this man had, in fact, become so intolerable, that he had let the cat out of the bag. No one now remained but the party entrenched behind the smoke and the mistress of the house. Pindar solemnly proposed to the captain that they should go and enjoy an oyster supper in company, and the proposal being cordially accepted, they rose in a body to take leave.

"A most delightful evening, Mrs. Legend," said Pindar with perfect truth; "much the pleasantest I ever passed in a house where one passes so many that are pleasant."

"I cannot properly express my thanks for the obligation you have conferred by making me acquainted with Mr. Truck," added Gray. "I shall cultivate his society as far as in my power, for a more capital fellow never breathed."

"Really, Mrs. Legend, this has been a charming night!" observed Pith as he made his bow; "I shall long remember it, and I think it deserves to be sung in verse."

Fun endeavoured to look sympathetic and sentimental, though the spirit within could scarcely refrain from grinning in Mrs. Legend's face. He stammered out a few compliments, however, and disappeared.

"Well, good night, marm," said Captain Truck, offering his hand cordially. "This has been a pleasant evening altogether, though it was warm work at first. If you like ships, I should be glad to show you the Montauk's cabin when we get back; and if you ever think of Europe, let me recommend the London line as none of the worst. We'll try and make you comfortable, and trust to me to choose a state-room; a thing I'm experienced in."

Not one of the wags laughed, until fairly confronted with the oysters; then, indeed, they burst out into a general and long fit of exuberant merriment, returning to it, between the courses from the kitchen, like the refrain of a song. Captain Truck, who was uncommonly well satisfied with himself, did not understand the meaning of all this boyishness; but he has often declared since, that a heartier or funnier set of fellows he never fell in with than his four last companions proved to be that night.

As for the literary soirée, the most profound silence has been maintained concerning it, neither of the wits there assembled having seen fit to celebrate it in rhyme, and Florio having actually torn up an impromptu for the occasion, that he had been all the previous day writing.

CHAPTER VII.

There is history in all men's lives,
Figuring the nature of the times deceas'd;
The which observed, a man may prophesy,
With a near aim, of the main chance of things
As yet not come to life.

King Henry IV.

The following morning the baronet breakfasted in State-street. While at table little was said concerning the events of the past night, though sundry smiles were exchanged, as eye met eye, and the recollection of the mystification returned. Grace alone looked grave, for she had been accustomed to consider Mrs. Legend a very discriminating person, and she had even hoped that most of those who usually figured in her rooms were really the clever persons they laid claim to be.

The morning was devoted to looking at the parts of the town which are appropriated to business, a party having been made for that express purpose under the auspices of John Effingham. As the weather was very cold, the carriages were ordered, although the distances were not great, and they all set off about noon.

Grace had ceased to expect a look of admiration from Eve in favour of any of the lions of New York, her cousin having found it necessary to tell her that, in a comparative sense at least, little was to be said in behalf of these provincial wonders. Even Mademoiselle Vieffville, now that the freshness of her feelings was abated, had dropped quietly down into a natural way of speaking of things; and Grace, who was quick-witted, soon discovered that, when she did make any allusions to similar objects in Europe, it was always to those that existed in some country town. A silent convention existed, therefore, to speak no more on such subjects, or if anything was said, it arose incidentally, and as though it were inseparable from the regular thread of the discourse.

When in Wall-street, the carriages stopped and the gentlemen alighted. The severity of the weather kept the ladies in the chariot, where Grace endeavoured to explain things as well as she could to her companions.

“What are all the people running after so intently?” inquired Mademoiselle Viefville. (The conversation was in French, but we shall render it freely into English, for the sake of the general reader.)

“Dollars, I believe, Mademoiselle.—Am I right, Grace?”

“I believe you are,” returned Grace laughing, “though I know little more of this part of the town than yourself.”

“Quelle foule! Is that building filled with dollars, into which the gentlemen are now entering? Its steps are crowded!”

“That is the Bourse, Mademoiselle, and it ought to be well lined, by the manner in which some who frequent it live. Cousin Jack and Sir George are going into the crowd, I see.”

We will leave the ladies in their seats a few minutes, to accompany the gentlemen in their way into the Exchange.

“I shall soon show you, Sir George Templemore,” said John Effingham, “what is peculiar to this country, and what, if properly improved, it is truly worth a journey across the ocean to see. You have been at the Royal Exchange in London, and at the Bourse of Paris, but you have never witnessed a scene like that to which I am about to introduce you. In Paris, you have beheld the unpleasant spectacle of women gambling publicly in the funds, but it was in driblets, compared to what you will see here.”

While speaking, John Effingham led the way up stairs into the office of one of the most considerable auctioneers. The walls were lined with maps, some representing houses, some lots, some streets, some entire towns.

“This is the focus of what Mr. Aristobulus Bragg calls the town trade,” said John Effingham, when fairly confronted with all these wonders. “Here, then, you may suit yourself with any species of real estate that heart can desire. If a ville is wanted, there are a dozen. Of farms, a hundred are in market; that is merely half a dozen streets, and here are towns, of dimensions and value, to suit purchasers.”

“Explain this; it exceeds comprehension.”

“It is simply what it professes to be. Mr. Hammer, do me the favour to step this way. Are you selling to-day?”

“Not much, sir. Only a hundred or two lots on this island, and some six or eight farms, with one smallish western village.”

“Can you tell us the history of this particular piece of property, Mr. Hammer?”

“With great pleasure, Mr. Effingham; we know you to have means, and hope you may be induced to purchase. This was the farm of old Volkert Van Brunt, five years since, off of which he and his family had made a livelihood for more than a century by selling milk. Two years since the son sold it to Peter Feeler for a hundred an acre, or for the total sum of five thousand dollars. The next spring Mr. Feeler sold it to John Search, as keen a one as we have, for twenty-five thousand; Search sold it, at private sale, to Nathan Rise, for fifty thousand, the next week; and Rise had parted with it to a company, before the purchase, for a hundred and twelve thousand cash. The map ought to be taken down, for it is now eight months since we sold it out in lots, at auction, for the gross sum of three hundred thousand dollars. As we have received our commission, we look upon that land as out of the market for a time."

"Have you any other property, sir, that affords the same wonderful history of a rapid advance in value?" asked the baronet.

"These walls are covered with maps of estates in the same predicament. Some have risen two or three thousand per cent within five years, and some only a few hundred. There is no calculation in the matter, for it is all fancy."

"And on what is this enormous increase in value founded?—Does the town extend to these fields?"

"It goes much farther, sir; that is to say, on paper. In the way of houses, it is still some miles short of them. A good deal depends on what you call a thing; in this market, now, if old Volkert Van Brunt's property had been still called a farm, it would have brought a farm price, but, as soon as it was surveyed into lots, and mapped—"

"Mapped!"

"Yes, sir; brought into visible lines, with feet and inches, instead of acres. As soon as it was properly mapped, it rose to its just value. We have a good deal of the bottom of the sea that brings fair prices, in consequence of its being well mapped."

Here the gentlemen expressed their sense of the auctioneer's politeness and retired.

"We will now go into the sale-room," said John Effingham, "where you shall judge of the spirit, or energy, as it is termed, which at this moment actuates this great nation."

Descending they entered a crowd, where scores were eagerly bidding against each other, in the fearful delusion of growing rich by pushing a fancied value to a still higher point. One was purchasing ragged rocks, another the bottom of rivers, a third a bog, and all on the credit of maps. Our two observers remained some time silent spectators of the scene.

"When I first entered that room," said John Effingham, as they left the place, "it appeared to me to be filled with maniacs. Now, that I have been in it several times, the impression is not much altered."

"And all these persons are hazarding their means of subsistence on the imaginary estimate mentioned by the auctioneer?"

"They are gambling as recklessly as he who places his substance on the cast of the die. So completely has the mania seized every one, that the obvious truth, a truth which is as apparent as any other law of nature, that nothing can be sustained without a foundation, is completely overlooked, and he who should now proclaim in this building principles that bitter experience will cause every man to feel within the next few years, would be happy if he escaped being stoned. I have witnessed many similar excesses in the way of speculations, but never an instance so gross, so widely spread, and so alarming as this."

"You apprehend serious consequences, then, from the reaction?"

"In that particular we are better off than older nations, the youth and real stamina of the country averting much of the danger; but I anticipate a terrible blow, and that the day is not remote when this town will awake to a sense of its illusion. What you see here is but a small part of the extravagance that exists, for it pervades the whole community in one shape or another. Extravagant issues of paper money, inconsiderate credits, that commence in Europe and extend throughout the land, and false notions as to the value of their possessions, in men who five years since had nothing, have completely destroyed the usual balance of things, and money has become so completely the end of life, that they cease to think of it as a means. The history of the world, probably, cannot furnish a parallel instance, of an extensive country that is so absolutely under this malign influence, as is the fact with our own at this present instant. All principles are swallowed up in the absorbing desire for gain, and national power, permanent security, the ordinary rules of society, law, the constitution, and everything that is usually so dear to men, are forgotten, or are perverted, in order to sustain this unnatural condition of things."

"This is not only extraordinary, but it is fearful!"

"It is both. The entire community is in the situation of a man who is in the incipient stages of an exciting intoxication, and who keeps pouring down glass after glass, in the idle notion that he is merely sustaining nature in her ordinary functions. This wide-spread infatuation extends from the coast to the extreme frontiers of the west, for, while there is a justifiable foundation for a good deal of this fancied prosperity, the true is so interwoven with the false, that none but the most observant can draw the distinction, and, as usual, the false predominates."

"By your account, sir, the tulip mania of Holland was trifling compared to this?"

"That was the same in principle as our own, but insignificant in extent. Could I lead you through these streets, and let you into the secret of the interests, hopes, infatuation, and follies that prevail in the human breast, you, as a calm spectator, would be astonished at the manner in which your own species can be deluded. But let us move, and something may still occur to offer an example."

"Mr. Effingham—I beg pardon, Mr. Effingham," said a very gentlemanly looking merchant, who was walking about the hall of the Exchange,—“what do you think now of our French quarrel?"

"I have told you, Mr. Bale, all I have to say on that subject. When in France, I wrote you that it was not the intention of the French government to comply with the treaty; you have since seen this opinion justified in the result; you have the declaration of the French minister of state, that, without an apology from this government, the money will not be paid; and I have given it as my opinion, that the vane on yonder steeple will not turn more readily than all this policy will be abandoned should anything occur in Europe to render it necessary, or could the French ministry believe it possible for this country to fight for a principle. These are my opinions, and you may compare them with facts, and judge for yourself."

"It is all General Jackson, sir—all that monster's doings! But for his message, Mr. Effingham, we should have had the money long ago."

"But for his message, or some equally decided step, Mr. Bale, you would never have it at all."

"Ah, my dear sir, I know your intentions are good, but I fear you are prejudiced against that excellent man, the King of France! Prejudice, Mr. Effingham, is a sad innovator on justice."

Here Mr. Bale shook his head, laughed, and disappeared in the crowd, perfectly satisfied that John Effingham was a prejudiced man, and that he himself was only liberal and just.

"Now, that is a man who wants for neither abilities nor honesty, and yet he permits his interests and the influence of this very speculating mania to overshadow all his sense of right, facts plain as noon-day, and the only principles that can rule a country in safety."

"He apprehends war, and has no desire to believe even facts, so long as they serve to increase the danger."

“Precisely so; for even prudence becomes a perverted quality, when men are living under an infatuation like that which now exists. These men live like the fool who says ‘there is no death!’”

Here the gentlemen rejoined the ladies, and the carriages drove through a succession of narrow and crooked streets, that were lined with warehouses filled with the products of the civilized world.

“Very much of all this is a part of the same lamentable delusion,” said John Effingham, as the carriages made their way slowly through the encumbered streets. “The man who sells his inland lots at a profit, secured by credit, fancies himself enriched, and he extends his manner of living in proportion; the boy from the country becomes a merchant, or what is here called a merchant, and obtains a credit in Europe a hundred times exceeding his means, and thus caters to these fancied wants. In this manner is every avenue of society thronged with adventurers, the ephemera of the same wide-spread spirit of reckless folly. Millions in value pass out of these streets, that go to feed the vanity of those who fancy themselves wealthy because they hold some ideal pledges for the payment of advance in price, like those mentioned by the auctioneer, and who have some such security for the eventual payment as one can find in calling a thing that is really worth a dollar, worth a hundred.”

“Are the effects of this state of things apparent in your ordinary associations?”

“In everything. The desire to grow suddenly rich has seized on all classes. Even women and clergymen are infected, and we exist under the active control of the most corrupting of all influences, ‘the love of money.’ I should despair of the country altogether, did I not feel certain that the disease is too violent to last, and entertain a hope that the season of calm reflection and of repentance, that is to follow, will be in proportion to its causes.”

After taking this view of the town, the party returned to State Street, where the baronet dined, it being his intention to go to Washington on the following day. The leave-taking in the evening was kind and friendly. Mr. Effingham, who had a sincere regard for his late fellow traveller, cordially invited him to visit the mountains in June, the time he had fixed on for his own return to his proper home.

As Sir George took his leave, the bells began to ring for a fire. In New York one gets so accustomed to these alarms, that near an hour had passed before any of the Effingham family began to reflect on the long continuance of the cries. A servant was then sent out to ascertain the reason, and his report made the matter rather more serious than usual.

We believe that in the frequency of these calamities, the question lies between Constantinople and New York. It is a common occurrence for twenty or thirty buildings to be burnt down in the latter place, and for the residents of the same ward to remain in ignorance of the circumstance until enlightened on the fact by the daily prints; the constant repetition of the alarms hardening the ear and the feelings against the appeal. A fire of greater extent than common had occurred a night or two previously to this, and a rumour now prevailed that the severity of the weather, and the condition of the hoses and engines, rendered the present danger double. On hearing this intelligence, the Messrs. Effingham wrapped themselves up in their overcoats, and went together into the street.

“This seems something more than usual, Ned,” said John Effingham, glancing his eye upward at the lurid vault, athwart which gleams of fiery light began to shine. “The danger is not distant, and it seems serious.”

Following the direction of the current, they soon found the scene of conflagration, which was in the very heart of those masses of warehouses, or stores, that John Effingham had commented on so lately. A short narrow street of high buildings was already completely in flames, and the danger of approaching the furnace, added to the frozen condition of the apparatus, the exhaustion of the firemen from their previous efforts, and the intense coldness of the night, conspired to make the aspect of things in the highest degree alarming.

The firemen of New York have that superiority over those of other places, that the veteran soldier obtains over the recruit. But the best troops can be appalled, and, on this memorable occasion, the celebrated firemen, from a variety of causes, became, for a time, little more than passive spectators of the terrible scene.

There was an hour or two during which all attempts at checking the conflagration seemed really hopeless, and even the boldest and most persevering scarcely knew which way to turn to be useful. A failure of water, the numerous points that required assistance, the conflagration extending in all directions from a common centre, by means of numberless irregular and narrow streets, and the impossibility of withstanding the intense heat in the choked passages, soon added despair to the horrors of the scene.

They who stood near the fiery masses, were freezing on one side with the Greenland cold of the night, while their bodies were almost blistered with the fierce flames on the other. There was something frightful in this contest of the elements, nature appearing to condense the heat within the narrowest possible limits, as if purposely to increase its fierceness. The effects were awful, for entire buildings would seem to dissolve at the touch, as the forked flames enveloped them in sheets of fire.

Every one being a-foot within the sound of the alarm, though all the more vulgar cries had ceased, as men would deem it mockery to cry murder in a battle, Sir George Templemore met his friends on the margin of this sea of fire. It was now drawing towards morning ; the conflagration was at its height, having already laid waste a nucleus of blocks, and it was extending by many lines in every possible direction.

“Here is a fearful admonition for those who set their hearts on riches,” observed Sir George Templemore, recalling the conversation of the previous day. “What, indeed, are the designs of man as compared with the will of Providence !”

“I foresee that this is le commencement de la fin,” returned John Effingham. “The destruction is already so great as to threaten to bring down with it the usual safe-guards against such losses, insurance, and one pin knocked over of so frail and delicate a fabric, the whole will become loose, and fall to pieces.”

“Will nothing be done to arrest the flames ?”

“As men recover from the panic, their plans will improve and their energies will revive. The wider streets are already reducing the fire within more certain limits, and they speak of a favourable change of wind. It is thought five hundred buildings have already been consumed, in scarcely half a dozen hours.”

That Exchange, which had so lately resembled a bustling temple of mammon, was already a dark and heated ruin, its marble walls being cracked, defaced, in a tottering condition, or having fallen down. It was situated on the confines of the ruin, and our party were enabled to take their position near it, to observe the scene. All in their immediate vicinity was assuming the stillness of desolation, while the flashes of fierce light in the distance still marked the progress of the conflagration. Those who knew the localities now began to speak of the natural or accidental barriers, such as the water, the slips, and the broader streets, as the only probable means of arresting the impending destruction. The cracking of the flames grew quickly distant, and the cries of the firemen were soon scarcely audible.

At this period in the frightful scene a party of seamen arrived, bearing powder in readiness to blow up various buildings in the streets that did not possess of themselves sufficient barriers to the advance of the flames. Led by their officers these gallant fellows, carrying in their arms the means of destruction, moved up steadily to the verge of the torrents of fire, and planted their kegs ; laying their trains with the hardy indifference that practice can alone create, and with an intelligence that did infinite credit to their coolness. This deliberate courage was rewarded with complete success, and house after house, crumbled to pieces under the explosion, happily without an accident.

From this time the flames became less ungovernable, though the day dawned and advanced, and another night succeeded, before they could be said to have been got fairly under. Weeks and even months passed, however, ere the smouldering ruins ceased to send up smoke, the fierce element continuing to burn like a slumbering volcano, as it might be in the bowels of the earth.

The day that succeeded this disaster was memorable for the rebuke it gave the rapacious longing for wealth. Men who had set their hearts on gold, and who prided themselves on its possession, and on that only, were made to feel its insecurity; and they who had walked abroad as gods so lately, began to experience how utterly insignificant are the merely rich when stripped of their possessions. Eight hundred buildings, containing fabrics of every kind, and the raw material in various forms, had been destroyed, as it were, in the twinkling of an eye.

A faint voice was heard from the pulpit, and there was a moment when those who remembered a better state of things began to fancy that principles would once more assert their ascendancy, and that the community would, in a measure, be purified. But this expectation ended in disappointment, the infatuation being too widely spread and too corrupting to be stopped even by this check, and the rebuke was reserved for a form that seems to depend on a law of nature, that of causing vice to bring with it its own means of punishment.

CHAPTER VIII.

First, tell me, have you ever been at Pisa?

SHAKSPEARE.

The conflagration alluded to, rather than described, in the preceding chapter, threw a gloom over the gaieties of New York, if that ever could be properly called gay which was little more than a strife in prodigality and parade. Eve regretted very little the interruption to scenes in which she had found no pleasure, however much she lamented the cause, and she and Grace passed the remainder of the season quietly, cultivating the friendship of such women as Mrs. Hawker and Mrs. Bloomfield, and devoting their time at home to the improvement of their minds and tastes, without ever again venturing within the hallowed precincts of such rooms as those of Mrs. Legend.

One consequence of a state of rapacious infatuation like that at which we have just hinted, is the intensity of selfishness which smothered all recollection of the past, and all just anticipations of the future, by condensing life, with its motives and engagements, into the present moment. Captain Truck, therefore, was soon forgotten, and the literati, as that worthy seaman had termed the associates of Mrs. Legend, remained just as vapid, as conceited, as ignorant, as imitative, as dependant, and as provincial as ever.

As the season advanced, our heroine began to look with longings towards the country. The town life of America offers little to one accustomed to it in older and more permanently regulated communities; and Eve was already heartily weary of crowded and noisy balls, (for a few were still given,) of the struggles of an uninstructed taste, and of entertainments in which extravagance was seldom relieved by the elegances and conveniences of a condition of society wherein more attention is paid to the fitness of things.

The American spring is the least pleasant of its four seasons, its character being truly that of "winter lingering in the lap of May." Mr. Effingham, who the reader will probably suspect, by this time, to be a descendant of a family of the same name that we have had occasion to introduce in another work, had sent orders to have his country residence prepared for the reception of our party; and it was with a feeling of delight that Eve stepped on board a steamboat, to escape from a town that, while it contains so much that is worthy of any capital, contains so much more that is unfit for any place, in order to breathe the pure air, and to enjoy the tranquil pleasure of the country. Sir George Templemore had returned from his southern journey, and made one of the party, by express arrangement.

"Now, Eve," said Grace Van Courtlandt, as the boat glided along the wharfs, "if it were any person but you, I should feel confident of having something to show that would extort admiration."

"You are safe enough in that respect, Grace, for a more imposing object in its way than this very vessel, eye of mine never before beheld. It is positively the only thing that deserves the name of magnificent I have yet seen since our return; unless, indeed, it may be magnificent projects."

"I am glad, dear coz, there is this one magnificent object, then, to satisfy a taste so fastidious."

As Grace's little foot moved, and her voice betrayed vexation, the whole party smiled, for while the individuals who composed it felt the justice of Eve's observation, they saw the real feeling that was at the bottom of her cousin's remark. Sir George, however, though he could not conceal from himself the truth of what had been said by the one party, and the weakness betrayed by the other, had too much sympathy for the provincial patriotism of one so young and beautiful not to come to the rescue.

"You should remember, Miss Van Courtlandt," he said, "that Miss Effingham has not yet had the advantage of seeing the Delaware, Philadelphia, the noble bays of the South, nor all that is to be found out of the single town of New York."

"Very true, and I hope yet to see her a sincere penitent for her unpatriotic admissions against her own country. You have seen the Capitol, Sir George Templemore; is it not, truly, one of the finest edifices of the world?"

"You will except St. Peter's, surely, my child?" observed Mr. Effingham with a smile, for he saw that the baronet was too embarrassed to give a ready answer.

"And the Cathedral at Milan?" said Eve, laughing.

"Et le Louvre?" cried Mademoiselle Vieffville, who had some such admiration for everything Parisian that Grace had for everything American.

"And, most especially, the north-east corner of the south-west end and of the north-west wing of Versailles?" said John Effingham, in his usual dry manner.

"I see you are all against me," rejoined Grace, "but I hope, one day, to be able to ascertain for myself the comparative merits of things. As nature makes rivers, I hope the Hudson, at least, will not be found unworthy of your admiration, gentlemen and ladies."

"You are safe enough there, Grace," observed Mr. Effingham, "for few rivers—perhaps no river—offer so great and so pleasing a variety, in so short a distance, as this."

It was a lovely bland morning in the last week of May, and the earth was already tinted with the soft hues of summer, while the atmosphere was assuming that hazy and solemn calm that renders the season so quiet and soothing, after the fiercer strife of the elements in winter. Under such a sky the Palisadoes, in particular, appeared to advantage, for though wanting in the terrific grandeur of an Alpine nature, and perhaps disproportioned to the scenery they adorn, they were yet bold and peculiar.

The velocity of the boat added to the charm of the passage, for there was not time for the scene to pall on the eye; no sooner was one object examined in its outlines than it was succeeded by another.

“An extraordinary taste is afflicting this country in the way of architecture,” said Mr. Effingham, as they stood gazing at the eastern shore; “nothing but a Grecian temple being deemed a suitable residence for a man in these classical times. Yonder is a structure, for instance, of beautiful proportions, and, at this distance, apparently of a precious material, and yet it seems better suited to heathen worship than to domestic comfort.

“The malady has infected the whole nation,” returned his cousin, “like the spirit of speculation; we are passing from one extreme to the other in this as in other things. One such temple, well placed in a wood, might be a pleasant object enough; but to see a river lined with them, with children trundling hoops before their doors, beef carried into their kitchens, and smoke issuing, moreover, from those unclassical objects chimneys, is too much even of a high class of taste. One might as well live in a fever. Mr. Aristobulus Bragg, who is a wag in his way, informs me that there is one town in the interior that has actually a market house on the plan of the Parthenon!”

“Il Capo di Bove would be a more suitable model for such a structure,” said Eve smiling. “But I think I have heard that the classical taste of our architects is anything but rigid.”

“This was the case rather than is,” returned John Effingham, “as witness all these temples. The country has made a quick and a great pas en avant in the way of the fine arts; and the fact shows what might be done with so ready a people under suitable direction. The stranger who comes among us is apt to hold the art of the nation cheap; but, as all things are comparative, let him inquire into its state ten years since, and look at it to-day. The fault just now is perhaps to consult the books too rigidly, and to trust too little to invention; for no architecture, and especially that of a domestic character, can ever be above serious reproach, until climate, the uses of the edifice, and the situation are consulted as leading considerations. Nothing can be uglier, per se, than a Swiss cottage, or anything more beautiful under its precise circumstances. As regards these unknown temples, which are the offspring of money merely, let them be dedicated to whom they may, I should exactly reverse the opinion, and say, that while nothing can be more beautiful per se, nothing can be in worse taste than to put them where they are.”

“We shall have an opportunity of seeing what Mr. John Effingham can do in the way of architecture,” said Grace, who loved to revenge some of her fancied wrongs by turning the tables on her assailant; “for I understand he has been improving on the original labours of that notorious Palladio, Master Hiram Doolittle!”

The whole party laughed, and every eye was turned on the gentleman alluded to, expecting his answer.

“You will remember, good people,” answered the accused by implication, “that my plans were handed over to me from my great predecessor; and, moreover, that they were originally of the Composite order. If, therefore, the house should turn out to be a little complex and mixed, you will do me the justice to remember the last important fact. At all events, I have consulted comfort; and that I would maintain it in the face of Vitruvius himself, is a sine quâ non in domestic architecture.”

“I took a run into Connecticut the other day,” said Sir George Templemore, “and at a place called New Haven I saw the commencement of a taste that bids fair to make a most remarkable town. It is true, you cannot expect structures of much pretension in the way of cost and magnitude in this country; but so far as fitness and forms are concerned, if what I hear be true, and the next fifty years do as much in proportion for that little city as I understand has been done in the last five, it will be altogether a wonder in its way. There are some abortions, it is true, but there are also some little jewels.”

The baronet was rewarded for this opinion by a smile from Grace, and the conversation changed. As the boat approached the mountains, Eve became excited,—a very American state of the system, by the way,—and Grace was still more anxious.

“The view of that bluff is Italian,” said our heroine, pointing down the river at a noble headland of rock, that loomed grandly in the soft haze of the tranquil atmosphere. “One seldom sees a finer or a softer outline on the shores of the Mediterranean itself!”

“But the highlands, Eve!” whispered the uneasy Grace. “We are entering the mountains.”

The river narrowed suddenly, and the scenery became bolder; but neither Eve nor her father expressed the rapture that Grace expected.

“I must confess, Jack,” said the mild, thoughtful Mr. Effingham, “that these rocks strike my eyes as much less imposing than formerly. The passage is fine, beyond a question; but it is hardly grand scenery.”

“You never uttered a juster opinion, Ned; though, after your eye loses some of the forms of the Swiss and Italian lakes, and of the shore of Italy, you will think better of these. The highlands are remarkable for the surprises they create, rather than for their grandeur, as we shall presently see. As to the latter, it is an affair of feet and inches, and is capable of arithmetical demonstration. We have often been on lakes beneath beetling cliffs of from three to six thousand feet in height ; whereas here the greatest elevation is materially less than two. But, Sir George Templemore, and you, Miss Effingham, do me the favour to combine your cunning, and tell me whence this stream cometh, and whither we are to go ?”

The boat had now approached a point where the river was narrowed to a width not much exceeding a quarter of a mile, and in the direction in which it was steering the waters seemed to become still more contracted, until they were lost in a sort of bay that appeared to be closed by high hills, through which however, there were traces of something like a passage.

“The land in that direction looks as if it had a ravine-like entrance,” said the baronet ; “and yet it is scarcely possible that a stream like this can flow there !”

“If the Hudson truly passes through these mountains,” said Eve, “I will concede all in its favour that you can ask, Grace.”

“Where else can it pass ?” demanded Grace exultingly.

“Sure enough. I see no other place.”

“The two strangers to the river now looked curiously around them in every direction. Behind them was a broad and lake-like basin, through which they had just passed ; on their left a barrier of precipitous hills, whose elevation was scarcely less than a thousand feet ; on their right, a high but broken country, studded with villas, farm-houses, and hamlets, and in their front the deep but equivocal bay mentioned.

“I see no escape,” cried the baronet gaily ; “unless, indeed, it be by returning.”

■ A sudden and broad sheer of the boat caused him to turn to the left, and then they whirled round an angle of the precipice, and found themselves in a reach of the river, between steep declivities, running at right angles to their former course.

“This is one of the surprises of which I spoke,” said John Effingham, “and which renders the highlands so unique ; for while the Rhine is very sinuous, it has nothing like this.”

The other travellers agreed in extolling this and many similar features of the scenery, and Grace was delighted ; warm-hearted, affectionate, and true, Grace loved her country like a relative or a friend, and took an honest pride in hearing its praises. The patriotism of Eve—if a word of a meaning so lofty can be applied to feelings of this nature—was more discriminating, her tastes having been formed in a higher school, and her means of comparison being so much more ample.

The party stopped at West Point for the night, and here everybody was in honest raptures ; Grace, who had often visited the place before, being actually the least so of the whole party.

"Now, Eve, I know that you do love your country," she said, as she slipped her arm affectionately through that of her cousin. "This is feeling and speaking like an American girl, and as Eve Effingham should!"

Eve laughed; but she had discovered that the provincial feeling was so strong in Grace that a discussion would probably do no good. She dwelt, therefore, with honest eloquence on the beauties of the place, and for the first time since they had met, her cousin felt as if there was no longer any point of dissension between them.

The following morning was the first of June, and it was another of those drowsy, dreamy days that so much aid a landscape. The party embarked in the first boat that came up, and as they entered Newburgh Bay the triumph of the river was established. This is a spot, in sooth, that has few equals in any region, though Grace still insisted that the excellence of the view was in its softness rather than in its grandeur. The country houses, or boxes—few could claim to be much more—were neat, well placed, and exceedingly numerous. The heights around the town of Newburgh, in particular, were fairly dotted with them, though Mr. Effingham shook his head in disapprobation as he saw one Grecian temple appear after another.

"As we recede from the influence of the regular architects," he said, "we find imitation taking the place of instruction; many of these buildings are obviously disproportioned, and then, like vulgar pretension of any sort, Grecian architecture produces less pleasure than even Dutch."

"I am surprised at discovering how little of a Dutch character remains in this state," said the baronet; "I can scarcely trace that people in anything; and yet, I believe, they had the moulding of your society, having carried the colony through its infancy."

"When you know us better, you will be surprised at discovering how little of anything remains of a dozen years," returned John Effingham. "Our towns pass away in generations like their people, and even the names of a place undergo periodical mutations, as well as everything else. It is getting to be a predominant feeling in the American nature, I fear, to love change."

"But, cousin Jack, do you not overlook causes in your censure? That a nation, advancing fast as this in wealth and numbers, should desire better structures than its fathers had either the means or taste to build, and that names should change with persons, are both quite in rule."

"All very true, Miss Effingham, though it does not account for the peculiarity I mean. Take Templeton, for instance. This little place has not essentially increased in numbers within my memory, and yet fully one half of its names is new. When he reaches his own home, your father will not know even the names of one half of his neighbours. Not only will he meet with new faces, but he will find new feelings, new opinions in the place of traditions that he may love, and an indifference to everything but the present moment. Even those who may have better feelings, and a wish to cherish all that belongs to the holier sentiments, are afraid to utter them, lest they meet with no sympathy."

"No cats, as Mr. Bragg would say."

"Jack is one who never paints en beau," said Mr. Effingham. "I should be very sorry to believe that a dozen short years can have made all these essential changes in my neighbourhood."

"A dozen years, Ned! You name an age. Speak of three or four, if you wish to find anything in America where you left it! The whole country is in such a constant state of mutation, that I can only liken it to that game of children, which, as one quits his corner, another runs into it, and he that finds no corner to get into, is the laughing-stock of the others. Fancy that dwelling the residence of one man from childhood to old age; let him then quit it for a year or two; on his return he would find another in possession who would treat him as an impertinent intruder, because he had been absent two years, and the other in possession of an eternity of the same period. An American, 'always,' in the way of usages, extends no further back than eighteen months. In short, everything is condensed into the present moment, and services, character, for evil as well as good, unhappily, and all other things, cease to have weight, except as they influence the interests of the day."

"This is the colouring of a professed cynic," observed Mr. Effingham, smiling.

"But the law, Mr. John Effingham," eagerly inquired the baronet, "surely the law would not permit a stranger to intrude in this manner on the rights of an owner?"

"The law books would do him that friendly office perhaps, but what is a precept in the face of practices so ruthless? 'Les absents ont toujours tort,' is a maxim of peculiar application in America."

"Property is as secure in this country as in any other, Sir George, and you will make allowances for the humours of the present annotator."

"Well, well, Ned, I hope you will find everything couleur de rose, as you appear to expect. You will get quiet possession of your house, it is true, for I have put a Cerberus in it that is quite equal to his task, difficult as it may be, and who has just as much relish for a bill of costs as any squatter can have for a trespass; but without some such guardian of your rights, I would not answer for it that you would not be compelled to sleep in the highway. ”

“ I trust Sir George Templemore knows how to make allowances for Mr. John Effingham’s pictures, ” cried Grace, unable to refrain from saying something any longer.

A laugh succeeded, and the beauties of the river again attracted their attention. As the boat continued to ascend, Mr. Effingham triumphantly affirmed that the appearance of things more than equalled his expectations, while both Eve and the baronet declared that a succession of lovelier landscapes could hardly be presented to the eye.

“ Whited sepulchres ! ” muttered John Effingham, “ all outside. Wait until you get a view of the deformity within. ”

As the boat approached Albany, Eve expressed her satisfaction in still stronger terms, and Grace was made perfectly happy by hearing her and Sir George declare that the place entirely exceeded their expectations.

“ I am glad to find, Eve, that you are so fast recovering your American feelings, ” said her beautiful cousin, after one of these expressions of agreeable disappointment, as they were seated at a late dinner in an inn. “ You have at last found words to praise the exterior of Albany, and I hope, by the time we return, you will be disposed to see New York with different eyes. ”

“ I expected to see a capital in New York, Grace, and, in this, I have been grievously disappointed. Instead of finding the taste, tone, convenience, architecture, streets, churches, shops, and society of a capital, I found a huge expansion of common-place things, a commercial town, and the least regulated society that I had ever met with. Expecting so much, where so little was found, disappointment was natural. But in Albany, although a political capital, I know the nature of the government too well to expect more than a provincial town, and in this respect I have found one much above the level of similar places in other parts of the world. I acknowledge that Albany has as much exceeded my expectations in one sense, as New York has fallen short of them in another. ”

“ In this simple fact, Sir George Templemore, ” said Mr. Effingham, “ you may read the real condition of the country. In all that requires something more than usual, there is a deficiency; in all that is deemed an average, there is something better than common. The tendency is to raise to a respectable height every thing that is elsewhere degraded; when this height is attained an attraction of gravitation commences that draws all towards the centre—a little closer than could be wished, perhaps."

"Ay, ay, Ned; this is very pretty, with your attraction and gravitation; but wait and judge for yourself of the average of which you now speak so complacently."

"Nay, John, I borrowed the image from you; if it be not accurate, I shall hold you responsible for its defects."

"They tell me," said Eve, "that all American villages are towns in miniature; children dressed in hoops and wigs. Is this so, Grace?"

"A little; there is too much desire to imitate the towns perhaps, and possibly too little feeling of country life."

"This is a very natural consequence, after all, of people's living entirely in such places," observed Sir George Templemore.

"One sees much of this on the continent of Europe, because the country population is merely a country population; and less of it in England, perhaps, because those who are at the head of society consider town and country as very distinct things."

"La campagne est vraiment délicieuse en Amérique," exclaimed Mademoiselle Viefville, in whose eyes, however, the whole country was little more than campagne.

The next morning our travellers proceeded by the way of Schenectady, whence they ascended the beautiful valley of the Mohawk by means of a canal boat, the cars that now fly along its length not having commenced their active flights at that time. With the scenery every one was delighted, for while it differed essentially from that through which the party had passed the previous day, it was scarcely less beautiful.

At a point where the necessary route diverged from the direction of the canal, carriages belonging to Mr. Effingham were in readiness to receive the travellers, and here they were also favoured with the presence of Mr. Bragg, who fancied such an attention might be agreeable to the young ladies, as well as to his employer.

CHAPTER IX.

“Tell me, where is fancy bred,
Or in the heart, or in the head?
How begot, how nourished?”

Song in Shakspeare.

The travellers were several hours in ascending the mountains, by a country road that could scarcely be surpassed by a French wheel-track of the same sort. Mademoiselle Viefville protested twenty times in the course of the morning, that it was a thousand pities Mr. Effingham had not the privilege of the corvée, that he might cause the approach to his terres to be kept in better condition. At length they reached the summit, a point where the waters began to flow southward, when the road became tolerably level. From this time their progress became more rapid, and they continued to advance two or three hours longer at a steady pace. Aristobulus now informed his companions that, in observance of instructions from John Effingham, he had ordered the coachman to take a road that led a little from the direct line of their journey, and that they had been travelling for some time on one of the more ancient routes to Templeton.

“I was aware of this,” said Mr. Effingham, “though ignorant of the reason. We are on the great western turnpike.”

“Certainly, sir, and all according to Mr. John’s request. There would have been a great saving in distance, and, agreeably to my notion, in horse-flesh, had we quietly gone down the banks of the lake.”

“Jack will explain his own meaning in his own good time,” returned Mr. Effingham, “and he has stopt the carriage and alighted with Sir George; a hint, I fancy, that we are to follow their example.” Sure enough, the second carriage was now stopped, and Sir George hastened to open its door.

“Mr. John Effingham, who acts as cicerone,” cried the baronet, “insists that every one shall put pied à terre at this precise spot, keeping the important reason a secret, however, in the recesses of his own bosom.”

The ladies complied, and the carriages were ordered to proceed with the domestics, leaving the rest of the travellers by themselves, apparently in the heart of a forest.

“It is to be hoped, Mademoiselle, there are no banditti in America,” said Eve, as they looked around them at the novel situation in which they were placed, and this, apparently, by a mere caprice of her cousin.

“Ou des sauvages,” returned the governess, who, in spite of her ordinary intelligence and great good sense, had several times that day cast uneasy and stolen glances into the bits of dark wood they had occasionally passed.

“I will insure your purses and your scalps, mesdames,” cried John Effingham, gaily, “on condition that you will follow me implicitly, and by way of pledge for my faith, I solicit the honour of supporting Mademoiselle Viefville on this unworthy arm.”

The governess laughingly accepted the conditions; Eve took the arm of her father, and Sir George offered his to Grace; Aristobulus, to his surprise, being left to walk entirely alone. It struck him, however, as so singularly improper that a young lady should be supported on such an occasion by her own father, that he frankly and gallantly proposed to Mr. Effingham to relieve him of his burthen; an offer that was declined with quite as much distinctness as it was made. “I suppose cousin Jack has a meaning to his melo-drama,” said Eve, as they entered the forest; “and I dear say, dear father, that you are behind the scene, though I perceive determined secrecy in your face.”

“John may have a cave to show us, or some tree of extraordinary height, for such things exist in the country.”

“We are very confiding, Mademoiselle, for I detect treachery in every face around us; even Miss Van Courtlandt has the air of a conspirator, and seems to be in league with something or somebody. Pray, heavens, it be not with wolves.”

“Des loups!” exclaimed Mademoiselle Viefville, stopping short, with a mien so alarmed as to extort a general laugh. “Est-ce qu’il y a des loups et des sangliers dans cette forêt?”

“No, Mademoiselle,” returned her companion,—“this is only barbarous America, and not civilized France. Were we in le département de la Seine we might apprehend some such dangers, but being merely in the mountains of Ostego, we are reasonably safe.”

“Je l’espère,” murmured the governess, as she reluctantly and distrustfully proceeded, glancing her eyes incessantly to the right and to the left. The path now became steep and rather difficult; so much so, indeed, as to indispose every one to conversation. It led beneath the branches of lofty pines, though there existed, on every side of them, proofs of the ravages man had committed in that noble forest. At length they were compelled to stop for breath, after having ascended considerably above the road they had left.

“I ought to have said that the spot where we entered on this path is memorable in the family history," observed John Effingham to Eve, "for it was the precise place where one of our predecessors lodged a shot in the shoulders of another."

"Then I know precisely where we are!" cried our heroine, "though I cannot yet imagine why we are led into this forest, unless it be to visit some spot hallowed by a deed of Natty Bumppo's!"

"Time will solve this mystery as well as all others. Let us proceed." Again they ascended, and, after a few more minutes of toil, they reached a sort of table-land, and drew near an opening in the trees, where a little circle had evidently been cleared of its wood, though it was quite small and untilled. Eve looked curiously about her, as did all the others to whom the place was novel, and she was lost in doubt.

"There seems to be a void beyond us," said the baronet; "I rather think Mr. John Effingham has led us to the verge of a view."

At this suggestion the party moved on in a body, and they were well rewarded for the toil of the ascent, by a view that was almost Swiss in character and beauty.

"Now, indeed, do I know where we are," exclaimed Eve, clasping her hands in rapture. "This is the 'vision,' and yonder is our blessed home!"

The whole artifice of the surprise was exposed, and after the first burst of pleasure had subsided, all to whom the scene was new, felt that they would not have missed this piquante introduction to the valley of the Susquehannah on any account.

That the reader may understand the causes of so much delight, and why John Effingham had prepared this scene for his friends, we shall stop to give a short description of the objects that now met the eyes of the travellers. It is known that they were in a small open spot in a forest, and on the verge of a precipitous mountain; the trees encircled them on every side but one, and on that one lay the panorama, although the tops of tall pines, that grew in lines almost parallel to the declivity, rose nearly to a level with their eyes.

Hundreds of feet beneath them, directly in front, and stretching leagues to the right, was a lake embedded in forests and hills. On the side next the travellers a fringe of forest broke the line of water, and, on the other, the landscape was limited by high broken hills, or low mountains rather, that were covered with farms, beautifully relieved by patches of wood, in a way to resemble the scenery of a vast park, or a royal pleasure ground. High valleys lay among these uplands, and in every direction comfortable dwellings dotted the fields. The dark hues of the evergreens, with which all the heights near the water were shaded, were in soft contrast to the livelier green of the other foliage, while the meadows and pastures were luxuriant with a verdure unsurpassed by that of England or Switzerland. Bays and points added to the exquisite outline of the glassy lake on the shore, while one of the former withdrew towards the north-west, in a way to leave the eye doubtful whether it saw the termination of the transparent sheet or not. Towards the south, bold, varied, but cultivated hills, also bounded the view, all teeming with the fruits of human labour, and yet all relieved by pieces of wood, in the way already mentioned, so as to give the entire region the character of park scenery. A wide, deep, even valley, commenced at the southern end of the lake, or nearly opposite the stand of our travellers, and stretched away south, until concealed by a curvature in the range of the mountains. Like all the hill tops, this valley was verdant, peopled, wooded in certain places, though less abundantly than the mountains, and teeming with the signs of life. Roads wound through its peaceful retreats, and might be traced working their way along the glens, and up the weary ascents for miles in every direction.

At the northern termination of this lovely valley, and on the margin of the lake, lay the village of Templeton, immediately under the eyes of the party. The distance, in a straight unbroken line, from their stand to the centre of the dwellings, could not be much less than a mile; but the atmosphere was so pure, and the day so calm, that it seemed much less. The children, and even the dogs, were seen running about the streets, while the shrill cries of boys at their gambols ascended distinctly to the ear.

As this was the Templeton of the Pioneers, and as the progress of society during half a century is connected with the circumstance, we shall give the reader a more accurate notion of its present state than can be obtained from incidental allusions. We undertake the office more readily because this is not one of those places that shoot up in a day under the unnatural efforts of speculation, or which, favoured by peculiar advantages in the way of trade, becomes a precocious city while the stumps still stand in its streets; but a sober country town, that has advanced steadily, pari passu, with the surrounding region, and offers a fair specimen of the more regular advancement of the whole nation in its progress towards civilization.

The appearance of Templeton, as seen from the height where it is now exhibited to the reader, was generally beautiful and map-like. There might be a dozen streets principally crossing each other at right angles, though sufficiently relieved from this precise delineation to prevent a starched formality. Perhaps the greater part of the buildings were painted white, as is usual in the smaller American towns, though a better taste was growing in the place, and many of the buildings had the graver and chaster hues of the grey stones of which they were built. A general air of neatness and comfort pervaded the place, it being in this respect as unlike a continental European town, south of the Rhine, as possible; if, indeed, we except the picturesque bourgs of Switzerland. In England, Templeton would be termed a small market town, so far as size was concerned; in France, a large bourg; while in America it was in common parlance, and by legal appellation, styled a village.

Of the dwellings of the place, fully twenty were of a quality that denoted ease in the condition of their occupants, and bespoke the habits of those accustomed to live in a manner superior to the great mass of their fellow-creatures. Of these, some six or eight had small lawns, carriage-sweeps, and the other similar appliances of houses that were not deemed unworthy of the honour of bearing names of their own. No less than five little steeples, towers, or belfries, for neither word is exactly suitable to the architectural prodigies we wish to describe, rose above the roofs, denoting the sites of the same number of places of worship, an American village usually exhibiting as many of these proofs of liberty of conscience,—caprices of conscience would perhaps be a better term,—as the dollars and cents of the neighbourhood will, by any practicable means, render attainable. Several light carriages, such as were suited to a mountainous country, were passing to and fro in the streets, and here and there a single horse vehicle was fastened before the door of a shop, or of a lawyer's office, denoting the presence of some customer from among the adjacent hills.

Templeton was not sufficiently a thoroughfare to possess one of those monstrosities, a modern American tavern, or a structure whose roof should overtop that of all its neighbours, including even the churches. Still its inns were of respectable size, well piazza'd, to use a word of our own invention, and quite enough frequented.

Near the centre of the place, in grounds of rather limited extent, still stood that model of the composite order, which owed its existence to the combined knowledge and taste of Mr. Richard Jones and Mr. Hiram Doolittle. We will not say that it had been modernized, for the very reverse was the effect, in appearance, at least; but it had, since last presented to the reader, undergone material changes, that were directed by the more instructed intelligence of John Effingham.

This building was so conspicuous by position and size, that as soon as they had taken in glimpses of the entire landscape, which was not done without constant murmurs of pleasure, every eye became fastened on it as the focus of interest. A long and common silence denoted how general was this feeling, and after the building had attracted their gaze, the whole party took seats on stumps and fallen trees before a syllable was uttered. Aristobulus alone permitted his look to wander, and he was curiously examining the countenance of Mr. Effingham, near whom he sat, with a longing to discover whether the expression was that of approbation or otherwise of the fruits of his cousin's genius.

"Mr. John Effingham has considerably regenerated and revived, not to say transmographed, the old dwelling," he said, cautiously using terms that might leave his own opinion of the changes doubtful; "the work of his hand has excited some speculation, a good deal of inquiry, and a little conversation throughout the county. It has almost produced an excitement!"

"As my house came to me from my father," said Mr. Effingham, across whose mild and handsome face a smile was gradually stealing, "I knew its history; and when called on for an explanation of its singularities, would refer them confidently to the composite order. But you, Jack, have supplanted all this by a style of your own, for explanations of which I shall be compelled to consult the higher authorities."

"Do you dislike my taste, Ned? To my eye the structure has no bad appearance from this spot."

"Fitness and comfort are indispensable requisites for domestic architecture, to use your own argument. Are you quite sure that yonder castellated roof, for instance, is altogether suited to the deep snows of these mountains?"

John Effingham whistled, as a gentleman will sometimes whistle, and endeavoured to look unconcerned, for he well knew that the very first winter had demonstrated the unsuitableness of his plans for such a climate. He had actually felt disposed to cause the whole to be altered privately at his own expense; but, besides feeling certain that his cousin would resent a liberty that inferred an indisposition to pay for his own buildings, he had a reluctance to admit in the face of the whole country that he had made so capital a mistake in a branch of art on which he prided himself more than common; almost as much, indeed, as his great predecessor, Mr. Richard Jones.

"If you are not pleased with the appearance of your dwelling, Ned," he said, "you can have at least the consolation of looking at some of your neighbours' houses, and perceiving that they are a great deal uglier. Of all abortions of this sort, to my taste, a Grecian abortion is the worst; mine is only Gothic, and that, too, in a style so modest, that I should think it might pass unmolested by any very furious criticism."

It was so unusual to see John Effingham on the defensive, that the whole party smiled ; while Aristobulus, who stood in salutary fear of his caustic tongue, both smiled and wondered.

“Nay, do not mistake me, John,” returned the proprietor of the edifice under discussion ; “it is not your taste that I will call in question, but your provision against the seasons. In the way of mere outward show, I really think you deserve high praise, for you have transformed a very ugly dwelling into one that is almost handsome, in despite of proportions, and of the necessity of regulating the alterations by prescribed limits. Still, I think there is a little too much of the composite left about even the exterior.”

“I hope, cousin Jack, you have not rashly innovated on the interior,” cried Eve ; “I think I shall remember that, and nothing is more pleasant than the catism of seeing things that you remember in childhood—pleasant, I mean, to those whom the mania of mutation has not afflicted.”

“Do not be unnecessarily alarmed, Miss Effingham,” replied her kinsman, with a pettishness of manner that was altogether extraordinary in a man whose mien in common was so singularly composed and masculine : “you will find all you knew, when a kitten, in its proper place. I could not rake together again the ashes of Queen Dido, which were scattered to the four winds of heaven, I fear, nor could I discover a reasonably good bust of Homer ; but respectable substitutes are provided, and some of them have the great merit of puzzling all beholders to tell to whom or what they belong ; which, I believe, was the great characteristic of most of Mr. Jones’s inventions.”

“I am glad to see, cousin Jack, that you have, at least, managed to give a very respectable ‘cloud colour’ to the whole house.”

“Ay ; it lay between that and an invisible green,” the gentleman answered, losing his momentary spleen in his natural love of the ludicrous ; “but finding that the latter would be only too conspicuous in the droughts that sometimes prevail in this climate, I settled down into the yellowish drab, which is, indeed, not unlike some of the richer volumes of the clouds.”

“On the whole, I think you are fairly entitled, as Steadfast Dodge, Esquire, would say, to ‘the meed of our thanks.’”

“What a lovely spot !” exclaimed Mr. Effingham, who had already ceased to think of his own dwelling, and whose eye was roaming over the soft landscape, athwart which the lustre of a June noontide was throwing its richest glories. “This is truly a place where one might fancy repose and content were to be found for the evening of a troubled life.”

“Indeed, I have seldom looked upon a more bewitching scene,” answered the baronet. “The lakes of Cumberland will scarce compete with this.”

“Or that of Brienz, or Lungern, or Nemi,” said Eve, smiling in a way that the other understood to be a hit at his nationality.

“C’est charmant!” murmured Mademoiselle Vieffville, “un si beau calme fait penser à l’éternité.”

“The farm you can see lying near yonder wood, Mr. Effingham,” coolly observed Aristobulus, “sold last spring for thirty dollars the acre, and was bought the summer before for twenty.”

“Chacun à son goût!” said Eve.

“And yet, I fear this glorious scene is marred by the envy, rapacity, uncharitableness, and all the other evil passions of man!” continued the more philosophical Mr. Effingham. “Perhaps it were better, as it was so lately, when it lay in the solitude and peace of the wilderness, the resort of birds and beasts.”

“Who preyed on each other, dearest father, just as the worst of our own species prey on their fellows.”

“True, child, true; and yet I never gaze on one of these scenes of holy calm, without wishing that the great tabernacle of nature might be tenanted only by those who have a feeling for its perfection.”

“Do you see the lady,” said Aristobulus, “that is just coming out on the lawn, in front of the ‘Wigwam?’” for that was the name John Effingham had seen fit to give the altered and amended abode;—“here, Miss Effingham, more in a line with the top of the pine beneath us.”

“I see the person you mean; she seems to be looking in this direction.”

“You are quite right, Miss; she knows that we are to stop on the Vision, and, no doubt, sees us. That lady is your father’s cook, Miss Effingham, and is thinking of the late breakfast that has been ordered to be in readiness against your arrival.”

Eve concealed her amusement, for by this time she had discovered that Mr. Bragg had a way peculiar to himself, or, at least, to his class, of using many of the commoner words of the English language.

It would, perhaps, be expecting too much of Sir George Templemore not to look for a smile on such an occasion.

“Ah!” exclaimed Aristobulus, pointing towards the lake, across which several skiffs were stealing, some in one direction, some in another; “there is a boat that I think must contain the poet.”

“Poet!” repeated John Effingham; “have we reached that pass of luxury at Templeton?”

“Lord, Mr. John Effingham, you must have very contracted notions of the place, if you think a poet a great novelty in it!

The lake and mountains have been poetized a dozen times in the last ten years. Why, sir, we have caravans of wild beasts nearly every summer!"

"This is, indeed, a step in advance of which I was ignorant. Here, then, in a region that so lately was tenanted by beasts of prey, beasts are already brought as curiosities. You perceive the onward state of the country in this fact, Sir George Templemore."

"I do, indeed; but I should like to hear from Mr. Bragg what sort of animals are in these caravans."

"All sorts, sir, from monkeys to elephants. The last had a rhinoceros."

"Rhinoceros!—Why, there was but one, lately, in all Europe. Neither the Zoological Gardens nor the Jardin des Plantes had a rhinoceros. I never saw but one, and that was in a caravan at Rome, that travelled between St. Petersburg and Naples."

"Well, sir, we have rhinoceroses here, and monkeys, and zebras, and poets, and painters, and congressmen, and bishops, and governors, and all other sorts of living animals."

"And who may the particular poet be, Mr. Bragg," asked Eve, "that honours Templeton with his presence just at this moment?"

"That is more than I can tell you, Miss, for, though some eight or ten of us have done little else than try to discover his name for the last week, we have not got even as far as that one fact. He, and the gentleman who travels with him, are both uncommonly close on such matters, though, I think, we have some as good catechisers in Templeton as can be found anywhere within fifty miles of us."

"There is another gentleman with him,—do you suspect them both of being poets?"

"Oh no, miss; the other is the waiter of the poet: we know this much, as he serves him at dinner, and otherwise superintends his concerns, such as brushing his clothes, and keeping his room in order."

"This is being in luck for a poet, for they are of a class that are a little apt to neglect the decencies. May I ask why you suspect the master of being a poet, if the man be so assiduous?"

"Why, what else can he be? In the first place, Miss Effingham, he has no name."

"That is a reason in point," said John Effingham; "very few poets having names now-a-days."

"Then he is out on the lake half his time, gazing up at the 'Silent Pine,' or conversing with the 'Speaking Rocks,' or drinking at the 'Fairy Spring.'"

"All suspicious circumstances certainly, especially the dialogue with the rocks, though not absolutely conclusive."

"But, Mr. John Effingham, the man does not take his food like other people. He rises early, and is out on the water or up in the forest all the morning, and then returns to eat his breakfast in the middle of the forenoon. He goes into the woods again, or on the lake, and comes back to dinner, just as I take my tea."

"This settles the matter. Any man who presumes to do all this, Mr. Bragg, deserves to be called by some harder name, even, than that of a poet. Pray, sir, how long has this eccentric person been a resident of Templeton?"

"Hist!—there he is, as I am a sinner!—and it was not he and the other gentleman that were in the boat."

The rebuked manner of Aristobulus, and the dropping of his voice, induced the whole party to look in the direction of his eye, and sure enough a gentleman approached them in the half-rustic dress which a man of the world is apt to assume in the country—an attire of itself that was sufficient to attract comment in a place where the prevailing wish was to be as much like town as possible. He came from the forest, along the table-land that crowned the mountain for some distance, and followed one of the foot-paths that the admirers of the beautiful landscape had made all over that pleasant wood. As he came out into the cleared spot, seeing it already in possession of another party, he bowed, and was passing on, with a delicacy that Mr. Bragg would be apt to think eccentric, when suddenly hesitating, he gave a look of intense and eager interest at the whole party, smiled,—advanced rapidly nearer, and discovered his entire figure.

"I ought not to be surprised," he said, as he advanced so near as to render doubt any longer impossible, "for I knew you were hourly looked for, and indeed I waited for your arrival; and yet this meeting has been so unexpected as to leave me scarcely in possession of my faculties."

It is needless to dwell upon the warmth of the greetings that followed. To the surprise of Mr. Bragg, his poet was not only known, but evidently much esteemed by all the party, with the exception of Miss Van Courtlandt, to whom he was soon cordially presented by the name of Powis. Eve managed by an effort of womanly pride to suppress the violence of her feelings, and the meeting passed off as one of mutual surprise and pleasure, without any exhibition of emotion to attract unusual comment.

"We ought to express our wonder at finding you here before us, my dear young friend," said Mr. Effingham, still holding Paul's hand affectionately between both his own; "and, even now, that my own eyes assure me of the fact, I can hardly believe you would arrive at New York, and quit it, without giving us the satisfaction of seeing you."

"In that you are not wrong, dear sir; certainly, nothing would have deprived me of that pleasure, but the knowledge that it would not have been agreeable to yourselves. My sudden appearance here, however, will be without mystery, when I tell you that I returned from England by the way of Quebec, the Great Lakes, and the 'Falls,' having been induced by my friend Ducie to take that route, in consequence of his ship being sent to the St. Lawrence. A desire for novelty, and particularly a wish to see the celebrated cataract, which is almost the lion of America, did the rest."

"We are glad to have you with us on any terms, and I take it as particularly kind that you did not pass my door. You have been here some days?"

"Quite a week. On reaching Utica, I diverged from the great route to see this place, not anticipating the pleasure of meeting you so early, it is true; but hearing you were expected, I determined to remain, with a hope, which I rejoice to find was not vain, that you would not be sorry to see an old fellow-traveller once more."

Mr. Effingham pressed his hands warmly again before he relinquished them, an assurance of welcome that Paul received with thrilling satisfaction.

"I have been in Templeton almost long enough," the young man resumed, laughing, "to set up as a candidate for the public favour, if I rightly understand the claims of a denizen. By what I can gather from casual remarks, the old proverb, that 'the new broom sweeps clean,' applies with singular fidelity throughout all this region."

"Have you a copy of your last ode, or a spare epigram in your pocket?" inquired John Effingham.

Paul looked surprised, and Aristobulus himself—a thing of unusual occurrence—was a little daunted. Paul looked surprised, as a matter of course; for although he had been annoyed, since his arrival in Templeton, by the curiosity that is apt to haunt village imaginations, he did not in the least suspect that his love of the beauties of nature had been imputed to devotion to the muses. Perceiving, however, by the smiles of those around him, that more was meant than was expressed, he had the tact to permit the explanation to come from the person that had put the question, if it were proper it should come at all.

"We will defer the pleasure of an explanation," continued John Effingham, "to another time. At present, it strikes me, that the lady of the lawn is getting somewhat impatient, and the déjeuner à la fourchette, that I have had the precaution to order, is probably waiting our appearance. It must be eaten, though under the penalty of being thought moonstruck rhymers by the whole state. Come, Ned, if you are sufficiently satisfied with looking at the Wigwam in a bird's eye view, we will descend and put its beauties to the more severe test of a close examination."

This proposal was readily accepted, though all tore themselves from the lovely spot with reluctance, and not until they had paused again and again to take another look.

"Fancy the shores of this lake lined with villas," said Eve, "church towers raising their solemn summits among those hills, each mountain crowned with a castle or a crumbling ruin, and all the other accessories of an old state of society, and what would then be the charms of the view!"

"Less than they are to-day, Miss Effingham," said Paul Powis, "for though poetry requires———you all smile——is it forbidden to touch on such subjects?"

"Not at all, so it be done in legitimate verse," returned the baronet. "You ought to know that you are now expected even to speak in doggerel."

Paul ceased, not knowing what excuse to make, and the whole party walked away from the place, light-hearted and laughing; Aristobulus being quite as merry as any of them, though he scarce knew why. But it was a ruling trait in the character of this person never to suffer himself to get behind the age.

CHAPTER X.

"It is the spot I came to seek,
My father's ancient burial-place;
It is the spot,—I know it well,
Of which our old traditions tell."

BRYANT.

From the day after their arrival in New York, or that on which the account of the arrests by the English cruiser had appeared in the journals, little had been said by any of our party concerning Paul Powis, or of the extraordinary manner in which he had left the packet at the very moment she was about to enter her haven. It is true that Mr. Dodge, when he arrived at Dodgeopolis, had dilated on the subject in his hebdomadal, with divers additions and conjectures of his own, and this, too, in a way to attract a good deal of attention in the interior; but, it being a rule with those who are supposed to dwell at the fountain of foreign intelligence, not to receive anything from those who ought not to be better informed than themselves, the Effinghams and their friends had never heard of his account of the matter.

While all thought the incident of the sudden return extraordinary, no one felt disposed to judge the young man harshly. The gentlemen knew that military censure, however unpleasant, did not always imply moral turpitude, and as for the ladies, they retained too lively a sense of his skill and gallantry to wish to imagine evil on grounds so slight and vague. Still it had been impossible altogether to prevent the obtrusion of disagreeable surmises, and all now sincerely rejoiced in seeing their late companion, once more among them, seemingly in a state of mind that announced neither guilt nor degradation.

On quitting the mountain, Mr. Effingham, who had a tender regard for Grace, offered her his arm, as he would have given it to a second daughter, leaving Eve to the care of John Effingham. Sir George attended to Mademoiselle Viefville, and Paul walked by the side of our heroine and her cousin, leaving Aristobulus to be what he himself called a "miscellaneous companion," or, in other words, to thrust himself into either set, as inclination might dictate, or accident offer. Of course the parties conversed as they walked, though those in advance would occasionally pause to say a word to those in the rear, and, as they descended, one or two changes occurred, to which we may have occasion to allude.

"I trust you have had pleasant passages," said John Effingham to Paul, as soon as they were separated in the manner just mentioned. "Three trips across the Atlantic in so short a time would be hard duty to a landsman, though you, as a sailor, will probably think less of it."

"In this respect I have been fortunate, the Foam, as we know from experience, being a good traveller, and Ducie is altogether a fine fellow and an agreeable messmate. You know I have had him for a companion both going and coming."

This was said naturally, and, while it explained so little directly, it removed all unpleasant uncertainty, by assuring his listeners that he had been on good terms, at last, with the person who had seemed to be his pursuer. John Effingham too well understood that no one messed with the commander of a vessel of war, in his own ship, who was in any way thought to be an unfit associate.

"You have made a material circuit to reach us, the distance by Quebec being nearly a fourth more than the direct road."

"Ducie desired it so strongly that I did not like to deny him."

Indeed he made it a point, at first, to obtain permission to land me at New York where he had found me, as he said; but to this I would not listen, as I feared it might interfere with his promotion, of which he stood so good a chance, in consequence of his success in the affair of the money. By keeping constantly before the eyes of his superiors, while engaged in the discharge of important duties, I thought his preferment would be more certain."

"And has his government thought his perseverance in the chase worthy of such a reward?"

"Indeed it has. He is now a Post, and all owing to his good luck and judgment in that affair; though, in his country, rank in private life does no harm to rank in public life."

Eve liked the emphasis that Paul laid on "his country," and she thought the whole remark was made in a spirit that an Englishman would not be apt to betray.

"Has it ever occurred to you," continued John Effingham, "that our sudden and unexpected separation has caused a serious neglect of duty in me, if not in both of us?"

Paul looked surprised, and, by his manner, he demanded an explanation.

"You may remember the sealed package of poor Mr. Monday, that we were to open together on our arrival in New York; and on the contents of which, we were taught to believe, depended the settling of some important private rights. I gave that package to you at the moment it was received, and, in the hurry of leaving us, you overlooked the circumstance."

"All very true, and, to my shame, I confess that, until this instant, the affair has been quite forgotten by me. I had so much to occupy my mind while in England, that it was not likely to be remembered, and then the packet itself has scarcely been in my possession since the day I left you."

"It is not lost, I trust!" said John Effingham, quickly.

"Surely not; it is safe, beyond a question, in the writing-desk in which I deposited it. But the moment we reached Portsmouth, Ducie and myself proceeded to London together, and as soon as he had got through at the Admiralty we went into Yorkshire, where we remained much occupied with private matters of great importance to us both, while his ship was docked; and then it became necessary to make sundry visits to our relations——"

"Relations!" repeated Eve involuntarily, though she did not cease to reproach herself for the indiscretion during the rest of the walk.

"Relations——," returned Paul, smiling. "Captain Ducie and myself are cousins-german, and we made pilgrimages together to sundry family shrines. This duty occupied us until within a few days of our sailing for Quebec. On reaching our haven, I left the ship to visit the great lakes and Niagara, leaving most of my effects with Ducie, who has promised to bring them on with himself, when he follows on my track, as he expected soon to do, on his way to the West Indies, where he is to find a frigate. He owed me this attention, as he insisted, on account of having induced me to go so far out of my way with so much baggage, to oblige him. The packet is, unluckily, left behind with the other things."

"And do you expect Captain Ducie to arrive in this country soon? The affair of the packet ought not to be neglected much longer, for a promise to a dying man is doubly binding, as it appeals to the generosity of us all. Rather than neglect the matter, I would prefer sending a special messenger to Quebec."

"That will be quite unnecessary, as indeed it would be useless. Ducie left Quebec yesterday, and has sent his and my effects direct to New York, under the care of his own steward. The writing case, containing other papers that are of interest to us both, he has promised not to lose sight of, but it will accompany him on the same tour as that I have just made, for he wishes to see the Niagara and the lakes also. He is now on my track, and will notify me by letter of the day he is to be in Utica, in order that we may meet on the line of the canal near this place, and proceed to New York in company."

His companions listened to this brief statement with an intense interest, with which the packet of poor Mr. Monday, however, had very little connection. John Effingham called to his cousin, and, in a few words, stated the circumstances, as they had just been related by the young man, without adverting to the papers of Mr. Monday, which was an affair that he had hitherto kept to himself.

"It will be no more than a return of civility if we invite Captain Ducie to diverge from his road, and pass a few days with us in the mountains," he added. "At what precise time do you expect him on the canal, Powis?"

"Within the fortnight. I feel certain he would be glad to pay his respects to this party, for he often expressed his regret at having been employed on a service that exposed the ladies to so much peril and delay."

"Captain Ducie is a near kinsman of Mr. Powis, dear father," added Eve, in a way to shew her parent that the invitation would be agreeable to herself; for Mr. Effingham was so attentive to the wishes of his daughter, as never to ask a guest to his house that he thought would prove disagreeable to its mistress.

“I shall do myself the pleasure to write to Captain Ducie this evening, urging him to honour us with his company,” returned Mr. Effingham. “We expect other friends in a few days, and I hope he will not find his time heavy on his hands while in exile among us. Mr. Powis will enclose my note in one of his letters, and will, I trust, second the request by his own solicitations.”

Paul made his acknowledgments, and the whole party proceeded, though the interruption caused such a change in the figure of the promenade as to leave the young man alone by the side of Eve. By this time they had not only reached the highway, but had again diverged from it, to follow the line of an old and abandoned wheel-track, that descended the mountain along the side of the declivity, by a wilder and more perilous direction than suited modern enterprise, it having been one of those little calculated and rude roads that the first settlers of a country are apt to make, before there is time and means to investigate and finish to advantage. Although much more difficult and dangerous than its successor as a highway, this relic of the infant condition of the country was by far the most retired and beautiful, and pedestrians continued to use it as a common foot-path to the Vision. The seasons had narrowed its surface; the second growth had nearly covered it with their branches, shading it like an arbour, and Eve expressed her delight in its wildness and boldness, mingled as both were with so pleasant a seclusion. Glimpses were constantly obtained of the lake and the village while they proceeded, and they who were altogether strangers to the scenery were loud in its praise.

“Most persons who see this valley for the first time,” observed Aristobulus, “find something to say in its favour; and for my part, I consider it as rather curious myself.”

“Curious!” exclaimed Paul; “that gentleman is at least singular in the choice of his expressions.”

“You have met him before to-day,” said Eve, laughing, for Eve was now in a humour to laugh at trifles. “This we know, for he had prepared us to meet a poet, where we only found an old friend.”

“Only! Miss Effingham.—Do you estimate poets so high, and old friends so low, then?”

“This extraordinary person, Mr. Aristobulus Bragg, really deranges all one’s notions and opinions in such a manner as to destroy even the usual signification of words, I believe. He seems so much in, and yet so much out of his place—is both so rusé and so unpractised—so unfit for what he is, and so ready at every thing, that I scarcely know how to apply terms in any matter with which he has the smallest connexion. I fear he has persecuted you since your arrival at Templeton?"

"Not at all; I am so much acquainted with men of his caste that I have acquired a tact in managing them. Perceiving that he was disposed to suspect me of a disposition to 'poetize the lake,' to use his own term, I took care to drop a couple of lines, roughly written off, like a hasty and imperfect effusion, where I felt sure he would find them, and have been living for a whole week on the fame thereof."

"You do indulge in such tastes, then?" said Eve, smiling a little saucily.

"I am as innocent of such an ambition as of wishing to marry the heiress of the British throne, which I believe, just now, is the goal of all the Icaruses of our own time. I am merely a rank plagiarist, for the rhyme, on the fame of which I have rioted for a glorious week, was in two lines of Pope, an author so completely forgotten in these palmy days of literature, in which all knowledge seems condensed into the productions of the last few years, that a man might almost pass off an entire classic for his own without the fear of detection. It was merely the first couplet of the Essay on Man, which, fortunately, having an allusion to the 'pride of kings,' would pass for original, as well as excellent, in nineteen villages out of twenty, in America, in these piping times of ultra republicanism! No doubt Mr. Bragg thought a eulogy on the 'people' was to come next, to be succeeded by a glowing picture of Templeton and its environs."

"I do not know that I ought to admit these hits at liberty from a foreigner," said Eve, assuming a look of seriousness not altogether in unison with her feelings, for never before, in her life, had our heroine so strong a consciousness of happiness as she had experienced that very morning.

"Foreigner, Miss Effingham! and why a foreigner?"

"Nay, you know your own pretended cosmopolitism; and ought not the cousin of Captain Ducie to be an Englishman?"

"I shall not answer for the ought, the simple fact being a sufficient reply to the question. The cousin of Captain Ducie is not an Englishman, nor, as I see you suspect, has he ever served a day in the British navy, or in any other than that of his native land."

"This is, indeed, taking us by surprise, and that most agreeably!" returned Eve, looking up at him with undisguised pleasure, while a bright glow crimsoned her face. "We could not but feel an interest in one who had so effectually served us, and both my father and Mr. John Effingham—"

"Cousin Jack," interrupted Paul, with emphasis.

"Cousin Jack, then, if you dislike the formality I used; both my father and cousin Jack examined the American Navy Register for your name without success, as I understood, and the inference that followed was fair enough, I believe you will admit yourself."

"Had they looked at a register of a few years' date they would have met with better luck. I have quitted the service, and am now a sailor only in recollections. For the last few years, like yourselves, I have been a traveller by land as well as by water."

Eve said no more, though every syllable that the young man had uttered was received by attentive ears, and retained with a scrupulous fidelity of memory. They walked some distance in silence, until they reached the grounds of a house that was beautifully placed on the side of the mountain, near a lovely wood of pines. Crossing these grounds, until they arrived at a terrace in front of the dwelling, the village of Templeton lay directly in their front, perhaps a hundred feet beneath them, and yet so near as to render the most minute object distinctly visible. Here they all stopped to take a more distinct view of a place that had so much interest with most of the party.

"I hope you are sufficiently acquainted with the localities to act as cicerone," said Mr. Effingham to Paul. "In a visit of a week to this village you have scarcely overlooked the Wigwam."

"Perhaps I ought to hesitate, or rather ought to blush to avow it," answered the young man, discharging the latter obligation by colouring to his temples; "but curiosity has proved so much stronger than manners, that I have been induced to trespass so far on the politeness of this gentleman as to gain an admission to your dwelling, in and about which more of my time has been passed than has probably proved agreeable to its inmates."

"I hope the gentleman will not speak of it," said Aristobulus; "in this country we live pretty much in common, and with me it is a rule when a gentleman drops in, whether stranger or neighbour, to show him the civility to ask him to take off his hat."

"It appears to me," said Eve, willing to change the conversation, "that Templeton has an unusual number of steeples; for what purpose can so small a place possibly require so many buildings of that nature?"

"All in behalf of orthodoxy, Miss Eve," returned Aristobulus, who conceived himself to be the proper person to answer such interrogatories. "There is a shade of opinion beneath every one of those steeples."

"Do you mean, sir, that there are as many shades of faith in Templeton as I now see buildings that have the appearance of being devoted to religious purposes?"

"Double the number, Miss, and some to spare into the bargain."

You see but five meeting-houses, besides the county buildings, and we reckon seven regularly hostile dominations in the village, besides the diversities of sentiment on trifles. This edifice that you perceive here, in a line with the chimneys of the first house, is New St. Paul's, Mr. Grant's old church; as orthodox a house in its way as there is in the diocese, as you may see by the windows. This is a gaining concern, though there has been some falling off of late, in consequence of the clergyman's having caught a bad cold, which has made him a little hoarse. I dare say he will get over it, however, and the church ought not to be abandoned on that account, serious as the matter may be for the moment. A few of us are determined to back up New St. Paul's in this crisis, and I make it a point to go there myself quite half the time."

"I am glad we have so much of your company," said Mr. Effingham, "for that is our own church, and in it my daughter was baptized. But do you divide your religious opinions in halves, Mr. Bragg?"

"In as many parts, Mr. Effingham, as there are denominations in the neighbourhood, giving a decided preference to New St. Paul's notwithstanding, under the peculiar circumstances, particularly to the windows. The dark, gloomy-looking building, Miss, far off in the distance yonder, is the Methodist affair, of which not much need be said, as methodism has flourished but little among us since the introduction of the New-lights, who have fairly managed to out-excite them. I believe, however, they stick pretty much to the old doctrine, which, no doubt, is one great reason of their present apathetic state, for the people do love novelties!"

"Pray, sir, what building is this nearly in a line with New St. Paul's and which resembles it a little in colour and form?"

"Windows excepted; it has two rows of regular square-topped windows, Miss, as you may observe. That is the first Presbyterian, or the old standard; a very good house, and a pretty good faith too, as times go. I make it a point to attend there at least once every fortnight, change being so agreeable to the nature of man. I will say, Miss, that my preference, however, as far as I have any, is for New St. Paul's, and I have experienced considerable regret that these Presbyterians have lately gained a material advantage over us in a very essential point."

"I am sorry to hear that, Mr. Bragg, for being an Episcopalian myself, and having great reliance on the antiquity and purity of my church, I should be sorry to find it put in the wrong by any other."

"I fear we must give the point up notwithstanding, for these Presbyterians have fairly outwitted the Church people in that matter."

“And what is the point in which we have been so signally worsted?”

“Why, Miss, their new bell weighs quite a hundred more than that of New St. Paul’s, and has altogether the best sound. I know very well that this advantage will not avail them anything to boast of in the last great account, but it makes a surprising difference in the state of probation. You see the yellowish-looking building across the valley, with a heavy wall around it, and a belfrey? That, in its regular character, is the county court-house and gaol; but, in the way of religion, it is used pretty much miscellaneously.”

“Do you really mean, sir, that divine service is ever actually performed in it, or that persons of all denominations are occasionally tried there?”

“It would be more consistent with truth to say that all denominations occasionally try the court-house,” said Aristobulus, simpering, “for I believe, first and last, it has been used in this way by people of every shade of religion short of the Jews. The ancient gothic tower in green wood is the building of the Universalists, and the Grecian edifice, that is not yet painted, belongs to the Baptists. The Quakers, I believe, worship chiefly at home, and the different shades of the Presbyterians meet, in different rooms, in private houses, about the place.”

“Are there, then, shades of difference in the denominations themselves, as well as all these denominations,” asked Eve, in unfeigned surprise, “and this, too, in a population so small?”

“Quite true, sir,” said Paul, “but here are many minds among few men. Nor is this all; agreeably to your own account, some of these men do not exactly know their own minds. But, can you explain to us what essential points are involved in all these shades of opinion?”

“It would require a life, sir, to understand half of them. Some say that excitement is religion, and others that it is contentment. One set cries up practice, and another cries out against it. This man maintains that he will be saved if he does good, and that man affirms that if he only does good he will be damned: a little evil is necessary to salvation with one shade of opinion, while another thinks a man is never so near conversion as when he is deepest in sin.”

“Subdivision is the order of the day,” observed John Effingham; “every county is to be subdivided that there may be more county towns and county officers; every religion is decimated, that there may be a greater variety and a better quality of saints.”

Aristobulus nodded his head, and he would have winked could he have presumed to take such a liberty with a man he held as much in habitual awe as John Effingham.

“Monsieur,” inquired Mademoiselle Viefville, “is there no église, no véritable église, in Templeton?”

“Oh yes, madam, several,” returned Aristobulus, who would as soon have thought of admitting that he did not understand the meaning of véritable église, as one of the sets he had been describing would think of admitting that it was not infallible in its interpretation of Christianity;—“several, but they are not to be seen from this particular spot.”

“How much more picturesque would it be, and even more Christian-like, in appearance at least,” said Paul, “could these good people consent to unite in worshipping God!—and how much does it bring into strong relief the feebleness and ignorance of man, when you see him splitting hairs about doctrines under which he has been told, in terms as plain as language can make it, that he is simply required to believe in the goodness and power of a Being whose nature and agencies exceed his comprehension!”

“All very true,” cried John Effingham, “but what would become of liberty of conscience in such a case? Most men, now-a-days, understand by faith a firm reliance on their own opinions.”

“In that case, too,” observed Aristobulus, “we should want this handsome display of churches to adorn our village. There is good comes of it, for any man would be more likely to invest his property in a place that has five churches than where there is only one. As it is, Templeton has as beautiful a set of churches as any village I know.”

“Say rather, sir, a set of castors, for a stronger resemblance to vinegar-cruets and mustard-pots, than is borne by these architectural prodigies, eyes never beheld.”

“It is, nevertheless, a beautiful thing to see the high-pointed roof of the House of God crowning an assemblage of houses, as one is apt to see in other countries,” said Eve, “instead of a pile of tavern, as is too much the case in this dear home of ours!”

While this remark was uttered they descended the steps that led from the terrace, and proceeded towards the village. On reaching the gate of the Wigwam, the whole party stood confronted with that offspring of John Effingham’s taste, for so great had been his improvements on the original production of Hiram Doolittle, that, externally at least, that distinguished architect could no longer have recognised the fruits of his own talents in the house in question.

“This is certainly carrying out to the full, John, the conceits of the composite order,” observed Mr. Effingham drily.

"I shall be sorry, Ned, if you dislike your house, as it is amended and corrected."

"Oh! cousin Jack," cried Eve, "it is an odd jumble of the Grecian and Gothic. One would like to know your authorities for such a liberty."

"What do you think of the façade of the cathedral of Milan, Miss?" laying emphasis on the last word, in imitation of the manner of Aristobulus. "Is it such a novelty to see the two styles blended? Or is architecture so pure in America, that you think I have committed the unpardonable sin?"

"Nay, nothing that is out of rule ought to strike one in a country where imitation governs in all things immaterial, and originality unsettles all things sacred and dear."

"By way of punishment for that bold speech, I wish I had left the old rookery in the state I found it, that its beauties might have greeted your eyes instead of this uncouth pile, which seems so much to offend them. Mademoiselle Vieffville, permit me to ask how you like that house?"

"Mais c'est un petit château."

"Un château Effinghamisé," said Eve, laughing.

"Effinghamisé, si vous voulez, ma chère; pourtant c'est un petit château."

"The general opinion in this part of the country is," said Aristobulus, "that Mr. John Effingham has altered the building on the plan of some edifice in Europe, though I forget the name of the particular temple; it is not, however, the Pantheon, nor the temple of Minerva."

"I hope at least," said Mr. Effingham, leading the way up the little lawn, "it will not turn out to be the Temple of the Winds."

CHAPTER XI.

"Nay, I 'll come : if I lose a scruple of this sport, Let me be boiled to death with melancholy."

SHAKSPEARE.

The progress of society in America has been distinguished by several peculiarities that do not so properly belong to the more regular and methodical advances of civilization in other parts of the world. On the one hand, the arts of life, like Minerva, who was struck out of the intellectual being of her father at a blow, have started full grown into existence, as the legitimate inheritance of the colonists, while, on the other, everything tends towards settling down into a medium, as regards quality, a consequence of the community-character of the institutions. Everything she had seen that day, had struck Eve as partaking of this mixed nature, in which, while nothing was vulgar, little even approached to that high standard which her European education had taught her to esteem perfect. In the "Wigwam," however, as her father's cousin had seen fit to name the family dwelling, there was more of keeping, and a closer attention to the many little things she had been accustomed to consider essential to comfort and elegance, and she was better satisfied with her future home than with most that she had seen since her return to America.

As we have had occasion already to describe the interior of this house, little remains to be said on the subject at present, for while John Effingham had completely altered its external appearance, its internal was not much changed. It is true, the cloud-coloured covering had disappeared, as had that stoop, also, the columns of which were so nobly upheld by their superstructures; the former having given place to a less obtrusive roof, that was regularly embattled; and the latter having been swallowed up by a small entrance tower, which the new architect had contrived to attach to the building, with quite as much advantage to it in the way of comfort as in appearance. In truth, the Wigwam had none of the more familiar features of a modern American dwelling of its class. There was not a column about it, whether Grecian, Roman, or Egyptian; no venetian blinds; no verandah or piazza; no outside paint, nor any blending of colours. On the contrary, it was a plain old structure, built with great solidity, of excellent materials, and in that style of respectable dignity and propriety that was perhaps a little more peculiar to our fathers than it is to their successors, our worthy selves. In addition to the entrance tower, or porch, on its northern front, John Effingham had also placed a prettily devised conceit on the southern, by means of which the abrupt transition from an inner room to the open air was adroitly avoided. He had moreover removed the "firstly" of the edifice, and supplied its place with a more suitable addition that contained some of the offices, while it did not disfigure the building, a rare feature in an architectural after-thought.

Internally, the Wigwam had gradually been undergoing improvements ever since that period which, in arts, if not in chronology, might be termed the dark ages of Ostego. The great hall had long before lost its characteristic decoration of the severed arm of Wolf, a gothic paper that was better adapted to the really respectable architecture of the room, being its substitute; and even the urn that was thought to contain the ashes of Queen Dido, like the pitcher that goes too often to the well, had been broken in a war of extermination that had been carried on against the cobwebs by a particularly notable housekeeper. Old Homer, too, had gone the way of all baked clay; Shakspeare himself had dissolved into dust, and of Washington and Franklin, even indigenous as they were, there remained no vestige. Instead of these venerable memorials of the past, John Effingham, who retained a pleasing recollection of their beauties as they had presented themselves to his boyish eyes, had bought a few substitutes in a New York shop; and a Shakspeare, and a Milton, and a Cæsar, and a Dryden, and a Locke, as the writers of heroic so beautifully express it, were now seated in tranquil dignity on the old brackets that had held their illustrious predecessors. Although time had as yet done little for this new collection in the way of colour, dust and neglect were already throwing around them the tint of antiquity.

“The lady,” to use the language of Mr. Bragg, who did the cooking of the Wigwam, having everything in readiness, our party took their seats at the breakfast-table, which was spread in the great hall, as soon as each had paid a little attention to the toilette. As the service was neither very scientific, nor sufficiently peculiar, either in the way of elegance or of its opposite quality, to be worthy of notice, we shall pass it over in silence.

“One will not quite so much miss European architecture in this house,” said Eve, as she took her seat at the table, glancing an eye at the spacious and lofty room in which they were assembled; “here is at least space and its comforts, if not elegance.”

“Had you lost all recollection of this building, my child?” inquired her father kindly. “I was in hopes you would feel some of the happiness of returning home, when you again found yourself beneath its roof!”

“I should greatly dislike to have all the antics I have been playing in my own dressing room exposed,” returned Eve, rewarding the parental solicitude of her father by a look of love, “though Grace, between her laughing and her tears, has threatened to do so. Anne Sidley has also been weeping, and as even Annette, always courteous and considerate, has shed a few tears in the way of sympathy, you ought not to imagine that I have been altogether so stoical as not to betray some feeling, dear father. But the paroxysm is past, and I am beginning to philosophize. I hope, cousin Jack, you have not forgotten that the drawing room is a lady's empire?"

"I have respected your rights, Miss Effingham, though, with a wish to prevent any violence to your taste, I have caused sundry antediluvian paintings and engravings to be consigned to the ——"

"Garret?" inquired Eve, so quickly as to interrupt the speaker.

"—Fire—" coolly returned her cousin. "The garret is now much too good for them, that part of the house being converted into sleeping rooms for the maids. Mademoiselle Annette would go into hysterics were she to see the works of art that satisfied the past generation of masters in this country, in too close familiarity with her Louvre-ized eyes."

"Point du tout, Monsieur," said Mademoiselle Viefville, innocently; "Annette a du goût dans son métier, sans doute, but she is too well bred to expect impossibilités. No doubt she would have conducted herself with decorum."

Everybody laughed, for much light-heartedness prevailed at that board, and the conversation continued.

"I shall be satisfied if Annette escape convulsions," added Eve, "a refined taste being her weakness; and, to be frank, what I recollect of the works you mention is not of the most flattering nature."

"And yet," observed Sir George, "nothing has surprised me more than the respectable state of the arts of engraving and painting in this country. It was unlooked for, and the pleasure has probably been in proportion to the surprise."

"In that you are right, Sir George Templemore," answered John Effingham; "but the improvement is of very recent date. He who remembers an American town half a century ago, will see a very different thing in an American town of to-day; and this is equally true of the arts you mention, with the essential difference that the latter are taking a right direction, under proper instruction, while the former are taking a wrong direction, under the influence of money, that has no instruction. Had I left much of the old furniture, or any of the old pictures, in the Wigwam, we should have had the bland features of Miss Effingham in frowns, instead of bewitching smiles, at this very moment."

"And yet I have seen fine old furniture in this country, cousin Jack."

"Very true, though not in this part of it. The means of conveyance were wanting half a century since, and few people risked finery of any sort on corduroys. This very house had some respectable old things that were brought here by dint of money, and they still remain; but the eighteenth century, in general, may be set down as a very dark antiquity in all this region."

When the repast was over, Mr. Effingham led his guests and daughter through the principal apartments, sometimes commending, and sometimes laughing at, the conceits of his kinsman. The library was a good-sized room, good-sized at least for a country in which domestic as well as public architecture is still in the chrysalis state. Its walls were hung with an exceedingly pretty Gothic paper in green, but over each window was a chasm in the upper border, and as this border supplied the arches, the unity of the entire design was broken in no less than four places, that being the precise number of the windows. The defect soon attracted the eye of Eve, and she was not slow in demanding an explanation.

"The deficiency is owing to an American accident," returned her cousin; "one of those calamities, many of which you, as an American mistress of a household, are fated to experience. No more of the border was to be bought in the country, and this is a land of shops, and not of fabricants. At Paris, Mademoiselle, one would send to the paper-maker for a supply; but, alas! he that has not enough of a thing with us, is as badly off as if he had none. We are consumers, and not producers of works of art. It is a long way to send to France for ten or fifteen feet of paper hangings, and yet this must be done, or my beautiful Gothic arches will remain for ever without their key-stones."

"One sees the inconvenience of this," observed Sir George; "we feel it, even in England, in all that relates to imported things."

"And we, in nearly all things but food."

"And does not this show that America can never become a manufacturing country?" asked the baronet, with an interest which an intelligent Englishman ever feels in that all-absorbing question. "If you cannot manufacture an article as simple as that of paper-hangings, would it not be well to turn your attention altogether to agriculture?"

As the feeling of this interrogatory was much more apparent than its logic, smiles passed from one to the other, though John Effingham, who really had a regard for Sir George, was content to make an evasive reply, a singular proof of amity in a man of his caustic temperament.

The survey of the house, on the whole, proved satisfactory to its future mistress, who complained, however, that it was furnished too much like a town residence.

“For,” she added, “you will remember, cousin Jack, that our visits here will be something like a villeggiatura.”

“Yes, yes, my fair lady; it will not be long before your Parisian and Roman tastes will be ready to pronounce the whole country a villeggiatura!”

“This is the penalty, Eve, one pays for being a Hajji,” observed Grace, who had been closely watching the expression of the other’s countenance; for, agreeably to her view of things, the Wigwam wanted for nothing to render it a perfect abode. “The things that we enjoy, you despise.”

“That is an argument, my dear coz, that would apply equally well as a reason for preferring brown sugar to white.”

“In coffee, certainly, Miss Eve,” put in the attentive Aristobulus, who, having acquired this taste in virtue of an economical mother, really fancied it a pure one; “everybody, in these regions, prefers the brown in coffee.”

“Oh, mon père et ma mère, comme je vous en veux,” said Eve, without attending to the nice distinctions of Mr. Bragg, which savoured a little too much of the neophyte in cookery to find favour in the present company,—“comme je vous en veux for having neglected so many beautiful sites, to place this building in the very spot it occupies.”

“In that respect, my child, we may rather be grateful at finding so comfortable a home at all. Compared with the civilization that then surrounded it, this dwelling was a palace at the time of its erection, bearing some such relation to the humbler structures around it as the château bears to the village tenement. Remember that bricks had never before been piled on bricks in the walls of a house in all this region when the Wigwam was constructed. It is the temple of Neptune of Otsego, if not of all the surrounding counties.”

Eve pressed to her lips the hand she was holding in both her own, and they all passed out of the library into another room. As they came in front of the hall-windows, a party of apprentice boys were seen coolly making their arrangements to amuse themselves with a game of ball on the lawn, directly in front of the house.

“Surely Mr. Bragg,” said the owner of the Wigwam, with more displeasure in his voice than was usual for one of his regulated mind, “you do not countenance this liberty?”

“Liberty, sir!—I am an advocate for liberty wherever I can find it. Do you refer to the young men on the lawn, Mr. Effingham?”

“Certainly, to them, sir; and permit me to say, I think they might have chosen a more suitable spot for their sports. They are mistaking liberties for liberty, I fear."

"Why, sir, I believe they have always played ball in that precise locality."

"Always!—I can assure you this is a great mistake. What private family, placed as we are in the centre of a village, could allow of an invasion of its privacy in this rude manner? Well may the house be termed a Wigwam, if this whooping is to be tolerated before its door."

"You forget, Ned," said John Effingham, with a sneer, "that an American 'always' means just eighteen months. Antiquity is reached in five lustres, and the dark ages at the end of a human life. I dare say these amiable young gentlemen, who enliven their sports with so many agreeable oaths, would think you very unreasonable and encroaching to presume to tell them they are unwelcome."

"To own the truth, Mr. John, it would be very unpopular."

"As I cannot permit the ears of the ladies to be offended with these rude brawls, and shall never consent to have grounds that are so limited, and which so properly belong to the very privacy of my dwelling, invaded in this coarse manner, I beg, Mr. Bragg, that you will at once desire these young men to pursue their sports somewhere else."

Aristobulus received this commission with a very ill grace, for while his native sagacity told him that Mr. Effingham was right, he too well knew the loose habits that had been rapidly increasing in the country during the last ten years not to foresee that the order would do violence to all the apprentices' preconceived notions of their immunities; for, as he had truly stated, things move at so quick a pace in America, and popular feeling is so arbitrary, that a custom of twelve months' existence is deemed sacred, until the public itself sees fit to alter it. He was reluctantly quitting the party on his unpleasant duty, when Mr. Effingham turned to a servant who belonged to the place, and bade him go to the village barber, and desire him to come to the Wigwam to cut his hair; Pierce, who usually performed that office for him, being busied with unpacking his trunks.

"Never mind, Tom," said Aristobulus, obligingly, as he took up his hat; "I am going into the street, and will give the message to Mr. Lather."

"I cannot think, sir, of employing you on such a duty," hastily interrupted Mr. Effingham, who felt a gentleman's reluctance to impose an unsuitable office on any of his dependants; "Tom, I am sure, will do me the favour."

"Do not name it, my dear sir; nothing makes me happier than to do these little errands, and, another time, you can do as much for me."

Aristobulus now went his way more cheerfully, for he determined to go first to the barber, hoping that some expedient might suggest itself by means of which he could coax the apprentices off the lawn, and thus escape the injury to his popularity that he so much dreaded. It is true, these apprentices were not voters, but then some of them speedily would be, and all of them, moreover, had tongues, an instrument Mr. Bragg held in quite as much awe as some men dread salt petre. In passing the ball-players he called out, in a wheedling tone, to their ring-leader, a notorious street-brawler,

"A fine time for sport, Dickey; don't you think there would be more room in the broad street than on this crowded lawn, where you will lose your ball so often in the shrubbery?"

"This place will do, on a pinch," bawled Dickey, "though it might be better. If it warn't for that plagued house, we couldn't ask for a better ball-ground."

"I don't see," put in another, "what folks built a house just in that spot for; it has spoilt the very best play-ground in the village."

"Some people have their notions, as well as others," returned Aristobulus; "but, gentlemen, if I were in your place, I would try the street. I feel satisfied you would find it much the most agreeable and convenient."

The apprentices thought differently, however, or they were indisposed to the change. Meanwhile the party in the house continued their examination of John Effingham's improvements, and when this was completed, they separated, each to his or her own room.

Aristobulus soon re-appeared on the lawn, and approaching the ball players, he began to execute his commission, as he conceived, in good earnest. Instead of simply saying, however, that it was disagreeable to the owner of the property to have such an invasion on his privacy, and thus putting a stop to the intrusion at the present moment, as well as for the future, he believed some address necessary to attain the desired end.

"Well, Dickey," he said, "there is no accounting for tastes; but, in my opinion, the street would be a much better place to play ball in than this lawn. I wonder gentlemen of your observation should be satisfied with so cramped a play-ground!"

"I tell you, 'Squire Bragg, this will do," roared Dickey; "we are in a hurry, and no way particular; the Bosses will be after us in half an hour. Heave away, Sam."

"There are so many fences hereabouts," continued Aristobulus, with an air of indifference ; “it’s true the village trustees say, there shall be no ball-playing in the street ; but I conclude you don’t much mind what they think or threaten.”

“Let them sue for that if they like,” bawled a particularly amiable blackguard, called Peter, who struck his ball as he spoke quite into the principal street of the village, — “Who’s a trustee, that he should tell gentlemen where they are to play ball !”

“Sure enough,” said Aristobulus, “and now, by following up that blow, you can bring matters to an issue. I think the law very oppressive, and you can never have so good an opportunity to bring them to a point. Besides, it is very aristocratic to play ball among roses and dahlias.”

The bait took, for what apprentice — American apprentice in particular — can resist an opportunity of showing how much he considers himself superior to the law. Then it had never struck any of the party before that it was vulgar and aristocratic to pursue the sport among roses, and one or two of them had actually complained that they had pricked their fingers in searching for the ball.

“I know Mr. Effingham would be very sorry to have you go,” continued Aristobulus, following up his advantage, “but gentlemen cannot always forego their pleasures for other folks.”

“Who’s Mr. Effingham, I should like to know?” cried Joe Wart ; “if he warnts people to play ball on his premises, let him cut down his roses. Come, gentlemen, I conform to ’Squire Bragg, and invite you all to follow me into the street.”

As the lawn was now evacuated en masse, Aristobulus proceeded with alacrity to the house, and went into the library, where Mr. Effingham was patiently waiting his return.

“I am happy to inform you, sir,” commenced the ambassador, “that the ball-players have adjourned, but as for Mr. Lather, he declines your proposition.”

“Declines my proposition !”

“Yes, sir ; he dislikes to come, for he thinks it will be altogether a poor operation. His notion is, that if it be worth his while to come up to the Wigwam to cut your hair, it may be worth your while to go down to his shop to have it cut. Considering the matter in all its bearings, therefore, he concludes he would rather not engage in the transaction at all.”

“I regret, sir, to have consented to your taking so disagreeable a commission, and regret it the more, now I find that the barber is disposed to be troublesome.”

“Not at all, sir. Mr. Lather is a good man in his way, and particularly neighbourly. By the way, Mr. Effingham, he asked me to propose to you to let him take down your garden fence, in order that he may haul some manure on his potato-patch, which wants it dreadfully, he says."

"Certainly, sir. I cannot possibly object to his hauling his manure even through this house, should he wish it. He is so very valuable a citizen, and one who knows his own business so well, that I am only surprised at the moderation of his request."

Here Mr. Effingham rose, rang the bell for Pierre, and went to his own room, doubting in his own mind, from all that he had seen, whether this was really the Templeton he had known in his youth, and whether he was in his own house or not.

As for Aristobulus, who saw nothing in what had passed out of rule, or contrary to his own notions of propriety, he hurried off to tell the barber, who was so ignorant of the first duty of his trade, that he was at liberty to pull down Mr. Effingham's fence, in order to manure his own potato-patch.

Lest the reader should suppose we are drawing caricatures, instead of representing the actual condition of society, it may be necessary to explain that Mr. Bragg was a standing candidate for popular favour, that, like Mr. Dodge, he considered everything that presented itself in the name of the public as sacred and paramount, and that so general and positive was his deference for majorities, that it was the bias of his mind to think half a dozen always in the right, as opposed to one, although that one, agreeably to the decision of the real majority of the entire community, had not only the law on his side, but all the abstract merits of the disputed question. In short, to such a pass of freedom had Mr. Bragg, in common with a large class of his countrymen, carried his notions, that he had really begun to imagine that liberty was all means and no end.

CHAPTER XII.

"——— In sooth, thou wert in very gracious fooling last night, when thou spokest of Pigrogrometus, of the Vapians passing the equinoctial of Quenbus—."

SIR ANDREW AGUECHEEK.

It has just been said, that the progress of society in what is termed a "new country," is a little peculiar. At the commencement of a settlement there is much of that sort of kind feeling and mutual interest which men are apt to manifest towards each other when they have embarked in an enterprise of common hazard. The distance that is unavoidably inseparable from education, habits, and manners, is lessened by mutual wants and mutual efforts; and the gentleman, even while he may maintain his character and station, maintains them with that species of goodfellowship and familiarity that mark the intercourse between the officer and soldier in an arduous campaign. Men, and even women, break bread together, and otherwise commingle, that in different circumstances would be strangers; the hardy adventure and rough living of the forest, apparently lowering the pretensions of the man of cultivation and mere mental resources to something very near the level of those of the man of physical energy and manual skill. In this rude intercourse the parties meet, as it might be, on a sort of neutral ground, one yielding something of his superiority, and the other laying claim to an outward show of equality, that he well understands, however, is the result of the peculiar circumstances in which he is placed. In short, the state of society is favourable to the claims of mere animal force, and unfavourable to those of the higher mental qualities.

This period may be termed, perhaps, the happiest of the first century of a settlement. The great cares of life are so engrossing and serious, that small vexations are overlooked, and the petty grievances that would make us seriously uncomfortable, in a more regular state of society, are taken as matters of course, or laughed at as the regular and expected incidents of the day. Goodwill abounds; neighbour comes cheerfully to the aid of neighbour; and life has much of the reckless gaiety, careless association, and buoyant merriment of childhood. It is found that they who have passed through this probation, usually look back to it with regret, and are fond of dwelling on the rude scenes and ridiculous events that distinguish the history of a new settlement, as the hunter is known to pine for the forest.

To this period of fun, toil, neighbourly feeling, and adventure, succeeds another, in which society begins to marshal itself, and the ordinary passions have sway. Now it is that we see the struggles for place, the heartburnings and jealousies of contending families, and the influence of mere money. Circumstances have probably established the local superiority of a few beyond all question; and the society of these serves as a goal for the rest to aim at. The learned professions,—the ministry included, or what by courtesy is so called, take precedence,—as a matter of course, next to wealth, however, when wealth is at all supported by appearances. Then commence those gradations of social station that set institutions at defiance, and which as necessarily follow civilization as tastes and habits are a consequence of indulgence.

This is, perhaps, the least inviting condition of society that belongs to any country that can claim to be free and removed from barbarism. The tastes are too uncultivated to exercise any essential influence; and when they do exist, it is usually with the pretension that notoriously accompanies infant knowledge. The struggle is only so much the more severe, in consequence of the late pêle mêle, while men lay claim to a consideration that would seem beyond their reach in an older and better regulated community. It is during this period that manners suffer the most, since they want the nature and feeling of the first condition, while they are exposed to the rudest assaults of the coarse-minded and vulgar; for, as men usually defer to superiority that is long established, there being a charm about antiquity that is sometimes able to repress even the passions, in older communities the marshalling of time quietly regulates what is here the subject of strife. What has just been said, depends on a general and natural principle, perhaps; but the state of society we are describing has some features peculiar to itself. The civilization of America, even in those older districts that supply the emigrants to the newer regions, is unequal—one state possessing a higher level than another. Coming as it does from different parts of this vast country, the population of a new settlement, while it is singularly homogeneous for the circumstances, necessarily brings with it these local peculiarities. If to such elements there be added a sprinkling of Europeans of various nations and conditions, the effect of the comingling, and the temporary social struggles that follow, will occasion no surprise.

The third and last condition of society in a “new country” is that in which the influence of the particular causes enumerated ceases, and men and things come within the control of more general laws. The effect, of course, is to leave the community in possession of a civilization that conforms to that of the whole region, be it higher or be it lower, and with a division into castes, that is more or less rigidly maintained, according to circumstances.

The periods—as the astronomers call the time taken in a celestial revolution—of the two first of these epochs in the history of a settlement, depend very much on their advancement in wealth and in numbers. In some places, the pastoral age, or that of good fellowship, continues for a whole life, to the obvious retrogression of the people in most of the higher qualities perhaps, but to their manifest happiness, so far as the pleasures of the time being are concerned; in others it passes away rapidly, like the buoyant animal joys that live their time between fourteen and twenty.

The second period is usually of longer duration, the migratory habits of the American people keeping society longer unsettled than might otherwise prove to be the case. It may be said never to cease entirely until the great majority of the living generation are natives of the region, knowing no other means of comparison than those under which they have passed their days. Even when this is the case, there is commonly so large an infusion of the birds of passage,—men who are adventurers in quest of advancement, and who live without the charities of a neighbourhood, as they may be said to live almost without a home,—that there is to be found, for a long time, a middle state of society, during which it may well be questioned whether a community belongs to the second or to the third of the periods named.

Templeton was properly in this equivocal condition; for while the third generation of the old settlers were in active life, so many passers-by came and went, that their influence nearly neutralized that of time and the natural order of things. Its population was pretty equally divided between the descendants of the earlier inhabitants and those who flitted like swallows and other migratory birds. All those who had originally entered the region in the pride of manhood, and had been active in converting the wilderness into the abodes of civilized men, if they had not, in a physical sense, been literally gathered to their fathers, had been laid, the first of their several races, beneath those sods that were to cover the heads of so many of their descendants. A few still remained among those who had entered the wilderness in early manhood; but the events of the first period we have designated, and which we have imperfectly recorded in another work, were already passing into traditions. Among these original settlers some portion of the feeling that had distinguished their earliest communion with their neighbours yet continued, and one of their greatest delights was to talk of the hardships and privations of their younger days, as the veteran loves to discourse of his marches, battles, sieges, and scars. It would be too much to say that these persons viewed the more ephemeral part of the population with distrust, for familiarity with change accustomed them to new faces; but they had a secret inclination for each other, preferred those who could enter sincerely into their own feelings, and naturally loved that communion best where they found the most sympathy. To this fragment of the community belonged nearly all which could be found of that sort of sentiment which is connected with locality—adventure, with them, supplying the place of time; while the natives of the spot, wanting in the recollections that had so many charms for their fathers, were not yet brought sufficiently within the influence of traditionary interest to entertain that hallowed sentiment in its proper force. As opposed in feeling to those relics of the olden time were the birds of passage so often named, a numerous and restless class, that, of themselves, are almost sufficient to destroy whatever there is of poetry, or of local attachment, in any region where they resort.

In Templeton, and its adjacent district, however, the two hostile influences might be said to be nearly equal; the descendants of the fathers of the country beginning to make a manly stand against the looser sentiments, or the want of sentiment, that so singularly distinguishes the migratory bands. The first began to consider the temple in which their fathers had worshipped more hallowed than strange altars, the sods that covered their fathers' heads more sacred than the clods that were upturned by the plough, and the places of their childhood and childish sports dearer than the highway trodden by a nameless multitude.

Such, then, were the elements of the society into which we have ushered the reader, and with which it shall be our duty to make him better acquainted as we proceed in the regular narration of the incidents of our tale.

The return of the Effinghams, after so long an absence, naturally produced a sensation in so small a place, and visitors began to appear in the Wigwam as soon as propriety would allow.

Many false rumours prevailed, quite as a matter of course; and Eve, it was reported, was on the point of being married to no less than three of the inmates of her father's house, within the first ten days, viz. Sir George Templemore, Mr. Powis, and Mr. Bragg; the latter story taking its rise in some precocious hopes that had escaped the gentleman himself, in the "excitement" of helping to empty a bottle of bad Breton wine that was dignified with the name of champagne. But these tales revived and died so often, in a state of society in which matrimony is so general a topic with the young of the gentler sex, that they brought with them their own refutation. The third day in particular, after the arrival of our party, was a reception day at the Wigwam, the gentlemen and ladies making it a point to be at home and disengaged after twelve o'clock, in order to do honour to their guests. One of the first who made his appearance was a Mr. Howel, a bachelor of about the same age as Mr. Effingham, and a man of easy fortune and quiet habits. Nature had done more towards making Mr. Howel a gentleman than either cultivation or association; for he had passed his entire life, with very immaterial exceptions, in the valley of Templeton, where, without being what might be called either a student or a scholar, he had dreamed away his existence in an indolent communication with the current literature of the day. He was fond of reading, and being indisposed to contention or activity of any sort, his mind had admitted the impressions of what he perused, as the stone receives a new form by the constant fall of drops of water. Unfortunately for Mr. Howel he understood no language but his mother tongue, and, as all his reading was necessarily confined to English books, he had gradually, and unknown to himself, in his moral nature at least, got to be a mere reflection of those opinions, prejudices, and principles, if such a word can properly be used to indicate such a state of mind, that it had suited the interests or passions of England to promulgate by means of the press. A perfect bonne foi prevailed in all his notions, and though a modest man by nature, so very certain was he his authority was always right, that he was a little apt to be dogmatical on such points as he thought his authors appeared to treat as settled. Between John Effingham and Mr. Howel there were constant amicable skirmishes, in the way of discussions; for while the latter was so dependant, so limited in knowledge, and so disposed to an innocent credulity, the former was original in his views, accustomed to see and think for himself, and moreover a little apt to estimate his own advantages at their full value.

"Here comes our old neighbour and my old school-fellow, Tom Howel," said Mr. Effingham, looking out at a window, and perceiving the person mentioned crossing the little lawn, in front of the house, by following a winding footpath, "as kind-hearted a man, Sir George Templemore, as exists; one who is really American, for he has scarcely quitted the county half a dozen times in his life, and one of the most gentle and honest fellows of my acquaintance."

"Ay," added John Effingham, "as real an American as any man can be, who uses English spectacles for all he looks at, English opinions for all he says, English prejudices for all he condemns, and an English palate for all he tastes. American, quotha! The man is no more American than the Times newspaper or Charing Cross! He actually made a journey to New York, last war, to satisfy himself with his own eyes, that a Yankee frigate had really brought into port an Englishman."

"His English predilections will be no fault in my eyes," said the baronet smiling, "and I dare say we shall be excellent friends."

"I am sure Mr. Howel is a very agreeable man," added Grace; "of all in your Templeton coterie he is my greatest favourite."

"Oh, I foresee a tender intimacy between Templemore and Howel," rejoined John Effingham, "and sundry wordy wars between the latter and Miss Effingham."

"In this you do me injustice, cousin Jack. I remember Mr. Howel well and kindly, for he was ever wont to indulge my childish whims when a girl."

"The man is a second Burchell, and I dare say never came to the Wigwam, when you were a child, without having his pockets stuffed with cakes or bonbons."

The meeting was cordial, Mr. Howel greeting the gentlemen like a warm friend, and expressing great delight at the personal improvements that had been made in Eve between the ages of eight and twenty. John Effingham was not more backward than the others, for he, too, liked their simple-minded, kind-hearted, but credulous neighbour.

"You are welcome back, you are welcome back," added Mr. Howel, blowing his nose, in order to conceal the tears that were gathering in his eyes. "I did think of going to New York to meet you, but the distance at my time of life is very serious. Age, gentlemen, seems to be a stranger to you."

"And yet we are both a few months older than yourself, Howel," returned Mr. Effingham kindly, "and have managed to overcome the distance you have just mentioned, in order to come and see you."

"Ay, you are great travellers, gentlemen, very great travellers, and are accustomed to motion. Been quite as far as Jerusalem, I hear!"

"Into its very gates, my good friend, and I wish with all my heart we had had you in our company. Such a journey might cure you of your home malady."

"I am a fixture, and never expect to look upon the ocean now. I did, at one period of my life, fancy such an event might happen, but I have finally abandoned all hope on that subject. Well, Miss Eve, of all the countries in which you have dwelt, to which do you give the preference?"

"I think Italy is the general favourite," answered Eve, with a friendly smile; "although there are some agreeable things peculiar to almost every country."

"Italy!—Well, that astonishes me a good deal! I never knew there was anything particularly interesting about Italy! I should have expected you to say England."

"England is a fine country too, certainly; but it wants many things that Italy enjoys."

"Well now, what?" said Mr. Howel, shifting his legs from one knee to the other, in order to be more conveniently situated to listen, or if necessary to object. "What can Italy possess that England does not enjoy in a still greater degree?"

"Its recollections for one thing, and all that interest which time and great events throw around a region."

"And is England wanting in recollections and great events? Are there not the Conqueror, or, if you will, King Alfred, and Queen Elizabeth, and Shakspeare?—Think of Shakspeare, my dear young lady, and Sir Walter Scott, and the Gunpowder Plot; and Cromwell—Oliver Cromwell, my dear Miss Eve—and Westminster Abbey, and London Bridge, and George IV.—the descendant of a line of real kings:—what, in the name of Heaven, can Italy possess to equal the interest one feels in such things as these!”

“They are very interesting, no doubt,” said Eve, endeavouring not to smile; “but Italy has its relics of former ages too: you forget the Cæsars.”

“Very good sort of persons for barbarous times, I dare say; but what can they be to the English monarchs? I would rather look upon a bonâ fide English king than see all the Cæsars that ever set fire to Rome. I never think any man a real king but the King of England.”

“What, not King Solomon!” cried John Effingham.

“Oh! he was a Bible king, and one never thinks of them. Italy! well, this I did not expect from your father’s daughter. Your great-great great grandfather must have been an Englishman born, Mr. Effingham?”

“I have reason to think he was, sir.”

“And Milton, and Dryden, and Newton, and Locke! These are prodigious names—worth all the Cæsars put together. And Pope, too; what have they got in Italy to compare to Pope?”

“They have at least the Pope,” said Eve, laughing.

“And then there are the Boar’s Head in Eastcheap, and the Tower, and Queen Anne, and all the wits of her reign; and—and—and Titus Oates, and Bosworth Field,—and Smithfield, where the martyrs were burned, and a thousand more spots of intense interest in old England!”

“Quite true,” said John Effingham, with an air of sympathy; “but, Howel, you have forgotten Peeping Tom of Coventry and the climate.”

“And Holyrood House, and York Minster, and St. Paul’s,” continued the worthy Mr. Howel, too much bent on a catalogue of excellences, that to him was sacred, to heed the interruption,—“and above all, Windsor Castle! What is there in the world to equal Windsor Castle, as a royal residence?”

Want of breath now gave Eve an opportunity to reply, and she seized it with an eagerness that she was the first to laugh at herself afterwards.

“Caserta is no mean house, Mr. Howel, and in my poor judgment, there is more real magnificence in its great staircase than in all Windsor Castle united, if you except the chapel.”

“But, St. Paul’s!”

“Why, St. Peter’s may be set down quite fairly, I think, for its pendant at least.”

“True, the Catholics do say so,” returned Mr. Howel, with the deliberation one uses when he greatly distrusts his own concession; “but I have always set it down as one of their frauds; I don’t think there can be anything finer than St. Paul’s. Then there are the noble ruins of England! They, you must admit, are unrivalled.”

“The Temple of Neptune, at Pæstum, is commonly thought an interesting ruin, Mr. Howel.”

“Yes, yes, for a temple, I dare say, though I do not remember to have heard of it before. But no temple can ever compare to a ruined abbey.”

“Taste is an arbitrary thing, Tom Howel, as you and I know; when boys, we quarrelled about the beauty of our ponies,” said Mr. Effingham, willing to put an end to a discussion that he thought a little premature, after so long an absence. “Here are two young friends who have shared the hazards of our late voyage with us, and to whom, in a great degree, we owe our present happy security, and I am anxious to make you acquainted with them.—This is our countryman, Mr. Powis, and this is an English friend, who, I am certain, will be happy to know so warm an admirer of his own country,—Sir George Templemore.”

Mr. Howel had never before seen a titled Englishman, and he was taken so much by surprise, that he made his salutations rather awkwardly. As both the young men, however, met him with the respectful ease that denotes familiarity with the world, he soon recovered his self-possession.

“I hope you have brought back with you a sound American heart, Miss Eve,” resumed the guest, as soon as this little interruption had ceased. “We have already had sundry rumours of French marquises and German barons, but I have, all along, trusted too much to your patriotism to believe you would marry a foreigner.”

“I hope you except Englishmen,” cried Sir George, gaily: “we are almost the same people.”

“I am proud to hear you say so, sir; nothing flatters me more than to be thought English, and I certainly should not have accused Miss Effingham of a want of love of country, had—”

—“She married half a dozen Englishmen,” interrupted John Effingham, who saw that the old theme was in danger of being revived. “But, Howel, you have paid me no compliments on the changes in the house. I hope they are to your liking?”

“A little too French, Mr. John.”

"French!—there is not a French feature in the whole animal. What has put such a notion into your head?"

"It is the common opinion, and I confess I should like the building better were it less continental."

"Why, my old friend, it is a non-descript,—an original,—Effingham upon Doolittle, if you will; and, as for models, it is rather more English than anything else."

"Well, Mr. John, I am glad to hear you say this; for I do confess to a disposition rather to like the house. I am dying to know, Miss Eve, if you saw all our distinguished contemporaries when in Europe?—that, to me, would be one of the greatest delights of travelling!"

"To say we saw them all, might be too much, though we certainly did meet with many."

"Scott, of course."

"Sir Walter we had the pleasure of meeting, a few times, in London."

"And Southey, and Coleridge, and Wordsworth, and Moore, and Bulwer, and D'Israeli, and Rogers, and Campbell, and the grave of Byron, and Horace Smith, and Miss Landon, and Barry Cornwall, and—"

"Cum multis aliis," put in John Effingham again, by way of arresting this torrent of names. "Eve saw many of these, and, as Jubal told Shylock, 'we often came where we did hear' of the rest. But you say nothing, friend Tom, of Goethe, and Tieck, and Schlegel, and La Martine, Châteaubriand, Hugo, Delavigne, Mickiewicz, Nota, Manzoni, Niccolini, etc."

Honest, well-meaning Mr. Howel listened to the catalogue that the other ran volubly over in silent wonder, for, with the exception of one or two of these distinguished men, he had never even heard of them, and, in the simplicity of his heart, unconsciously to himself, he had believed that there was no great personage still living of whom he did not know something, or who did not pass most of his time in England.

"Ah, here comes young Wenham, by way of preserving the equilibrium," resumed John Effingham, looking out of a window. "I rather think you must have forgotten him, Ned, though you remember his father, beyond question."

Mr. Effingham and his cousin went out into the hall to receive the new guest, with whom the latter had become acquainted while superintending the repairs of the Wigwam.

Mr. Wenham was the son of a successful lawyer in the county, and being an only child he had succeeded to an easy independence. His age, however, brought him rather into the generation to which Eve belonged than into that of the father; and if Mr.

Howel was a reflection, or rather a continuation, of all the provincial notions that America entertained of England forty years ago, Mr. Wenham might almost be said to belong to the opposite school, and to be as ultra American as his neighbour was ultra British. If there is la jeune France, there is also la jeune Amérique, although the votaries of the latter march with less hardy steps than the votaries of the former. Mr. Wenham fancied himself a paragon of national independence, and was constantly talking of American excellences, though the ancient impressions still lingered in his moral system, as men, in after life, look askance for the ghost which frightened their childhood, on crossing a churchyard in the dark. John Effingham knew the penchant of the young man, and when he said that he came happily to preserve the equilibrium, he alluded to this striking difference in the characters of their two friends.

The introductions and salutations over, we shall resume the conversation that succeeded in the drawing-room.

“You must be much gratified, Miss Effingham,” observed Mr. Wenham, who, like a true American, being a young man himself, supposed it de rigueur to address a young lady in preference to any other person present, “with the great progress made by our country since you went abroad.”

Eve simply answered, that her extreme youth, when she left home, had prevented her from retaining any precise notions on such subjects. “I dare say it is all very true,” she added; “but one, like myself, who remembers only older countries, is, I think, a little more apt to be struck with the deficiencies than with what may, in truth, be improvements, though they still fall short of excellence.”

Mr. Wenham looked vexed—or indignant would be a better word, perhaps; but he succeeded in preserving his coolness, a thing that is not always easy to one of provincial habits and education, when he finds his own beau idéal lightly estimated by others.

“Miss Effingham must discover a thousand imperfections in this country,” said Mr. Howel, “coming as she does directly from England.—That music, now—” alluding to the sounds of a flute that were heard through the open windows, issuing from a room in the adjacent village—“must be rude enough to her ear after the music in London.”

“The street music of London is certainly among the best, if not the very best, in Europe,” returned Eve, with a glance of the eye at the baronet that caused him to smile; “and I think this fairly belongs to the class, being so freely given to the neighbourhood.”

“Have you read the articles signed Minerva, in the Hebdo-madal, Miss Effingham?" inquired Mr. Wenham, who was determined to try the young lady on a point of sentiment, having succeeded so ill in his first attempt to interest her; — "they are generally thought to be a great acquisition to American literature."

"Well, Wenham, you are a fortunate man," interposed Mr. Howel, "if you can find any literature in America to add to or to subtract from. Beyond almanacks, reports of cases badly got up, and newspaper verses, I know nothing that deserves such a name."

"We may not print on as fine paper, Mr. Howel, or do up the books in as handsome bindings, as other people," said Mr. Wenham, bridling and looking grave; "but, so far as sentiments or sound sense are concerned, American literature need turn its back on no literature of the day."

"By the way, Mr. Effingham, you were in Russia; did you happen to see the emperor?"

"I had that pleasure, Mr. Howel."

"And is he really the monster we have been taught to believe him?"

"Monster!" exclaimed the upright Mr. Effingham, fairly recoiling a step in surprise. "In what sense a monster, my worthy friend? surely not in a physical!"

"I do not know that. I have somehow got the notion he is anything but handsome. A mean, butchering, bloodyminded looking little chap, I'll engage."

"You are libelling one of the finest men of the age."

"I think I would submit it to a jury. I cannot believe, after what I have read of him in the English publications, that he is so very handsome."

"But, my good neighbour, these English publications must be wrong, prejudiced perhaps, or even malignant."

"Oh! I am not the man to be imposed on in that way. Besides, what motive could an English writer have for belying an Emperor of Russia?"

"Sure enough, what motive!" exclaimed John Effingham. "You have your answer, Ned!"

"But you will remember, Mr. Howel," Eve interrupted, "that we have seen the Emperor Nicholas."

"I dare say, Miss Eve, that your gentle nature was disposed to judge him as kindly as possible, and then I think most Americans, ever since the congress of Ghent, have been disposed to view all Russians too favourably. No, no; I am satisfied with the account of the English; they live much nearer to St. Petersburg than we do, and they are more accustomed, too, to give accounts of such matters."

"But living nearer, Tom Howel," cried Mr. Effingham, with unusual animation, "in such a case is of no avail, unless one lives near enough to see with his own eyes."

"Well, well, my good friend, we will talk of this another time. I know your disposition to look at everybody with lenient eyes. I will now wish you all a good morning, and hope soon to see you again. Miss Eve, I have one word to say, if you dare trust yourself with a youth of fifty for a minute in the library."

Eve rose cheerfully, and led the way to the room her father's visiter had named. When within it, Mr. Howel shut the door carefully, and then, with a sort of eager delight, he exclaimed—

"For heaven's sake, my dear young lady, tell me who are these two strange gentlemen in the other room."

"Precisely the persons my father mentioned, Mr. Howel—Mr. Paul Powis and Sir George Templemore."

"Englishmen, of course."

"Sir George Templemore is, of course, as you say; but we may boast of Mr. Powis as a countryman."

"Sir-George Templemore!—what a superb-looking young fellow!"

"Why, yes," returned Eve, laughing, "he, at least, you will admit is a handsome man."

"He is wonderful!—the other, Mr. a—a—a—I forget what you called him,—he is pretty well too; but this Sir George is a princely youth!"

"I rather think a majority of observers would give the preference to the appearance of Mr. Powis," said Eve, struggling to be steady, but permitting a blush to heighten her colour in spite of the effort.

"What could have induced him to come up among these mountains,—an English baronet!" resumed Mr. Howel, without thinking of Eve's confusion. "Is he a real lord?"

"Only a little baron, Mr. Howel. You heard what my father said of our having been fellow-travellers."

"But what does he think of us? I am dying to know what such a man really thinks of us."

"It is not always easy to discover what such men really think; although I am inclined to believe that he is disposed to think rather favourably of some of us."

"Ay, of you, and your father, and Mr. John; you have travelled, and are more than half Europeans; but what can he think of those who have never left America?"

"Even of some of those," returned Eve, smiling, "I suspect he thinks partially."

“Well, I am glad of that. Do you happen to know his opinion of the Emperor Nicholas?”

“Indeed, I do not remember to have heard him mention the Emperor’s name, nor do I think he has ever seen him.”

“That is extraordinary! such a man should have seen everything and know everything; but I’ll engage, at the bottom, he does know all about him. If you happen to have any old English newspapers as wrappers, or by any other accident, let me beg them of you. I care not how old they are. An English journal fifty years old is more interesting than one of ours wet from the press.”

Eve promised to send him a package, when they shook hands and parted. As she was crossing the hall to join the party, John Effingham stopped her.

“Has Howel made proposals?” the gentleman inquired, in an affected whisper.

“None, cousin Jack, beyond an offer to read all the old English newspapers I can send him.”

“Yes, yes, Tom Howel will swallow all the nonsense that is timbre à Londres.”

“I confess a good deal of surprise at finding a respectable and intelligent man so weak-minded as to give credit to such authorities, or to form his serious opinions on information derived from such a source.”

“You may be surprised, Eve, at hearing such frank avowals of the weakness, but as for the weakness itself, you are now in a country for which England does all the thinking, except on subjects that touch the current events of the day.”

“Nay, I will not believe this! If it were true, how came we independent of her—where did we get spirit to war against her?”

“The man who has attained his majority is independent of his father’s legal control, without being independent of the lessons he was taught when a child. The soldier sometimes mutinies, and, after the contest is over, he is usually the most submissive man of the regiment.”

“All this, to me, is very astonishing! I confess that a great deal has struck me unpleasantly in this way since our return, especially in ordinary society; but I never could have supposed it had reached the pass to which I see it existing in our good neighbour Howel.”

“You have witnessed one of the effects in a matter of no great moment to ourselves; but, as time and years afford the means of observation and comparison, you will perceive the effects in matters of the last importance in a national point of view. It is in human nature to undervalue the things with which we are familiar, and to form false estimates of those which are remote, either by time or by distance. But go into the drawing-room, and in young Wenham you will find one who fancies himself a votary of a new school, although his prejudices and mental dependence are scarcely less obvious than those of poor Tom Howel."

The arrival of more company, among whom were several ladies, compelled Eve to defer an examination of Mr. Wenham's peculiarity to another opportunity. She found many of her own sex, whom she had left children, grown into womanhood, and not a few of them at a period of life when they should be cultivating their physical and moral powers, already oppressed with the cares and feebleness that weigh so heavily on the young American wife.

CHAPTER XIII.

"Nay, we must longer kneel; I am a suitor."

QUEEN KATHARINE.

The Effinghams were soon regularly domesticated, and the usual civilities had been exchanged. Many of their old friends resumed their ancient intercourse, and some new acquaintances had been made. The few first visits were, as usual, rather laborious and formal, but things soon took their natural course, and as the ease of country life was the aim of the family, the temporary little bustle was quickly forgotten.

The dressing-room of Eve overlooked the lake, and about a week after her arrival she was seated in it at her toilette-table. Annette was in attendance as usual, while Anne Sidley, who was unconsciously jealous that any one should be employed about her darling, busied herself in preparing the different articles of attire that she fancied her young mistress might be disposed to wear that morning. Grace was also in the room, having escaped from the hands of her own maid, in order to look into one of those books which profess to give an account of the extraction and families of the higher classes of Great Britain; a copy of which Eve happened to possess among a large collection of road books, Almanachs de Gotha, Court Guides, and other similar works that she had found it convenient to possess as a traveller.

"Oh! here it is," said Grace, in the eagerness of one who is suddenly successful after a long and vexatious search.

"Here is what, coz?"

Grace coloured, and she could have bitten her tongue for its indiscretion, but, too ingenuous to deceive, she reluctantly told the truth.

"I was merely looking for the account of Sir George Templemore's family; it is awkward to be domesticated with one of whose family we are utterly ignorant."

"Have you found the name?"

"Yes; I see he has two sisters, both of whom are married, and a brother, who is in the Guards. But—"

"But what, dear?"

"His title is not so very old."

"The title of no baronet is very old, the order itself having been instituted in the reign of James I."

"I did not know that. His ancestor was created a baronet in 1700, I see. Now, Eve—"

"Now, what, Grace?"

"We are both—" Grace would not confine the remark to herself—"we are both of older families than this! You have even a much higher English extraction, and I think I can claim for the Van Courtlandts more antiquity than one that dates from 1700!"

"No one doubts it, Grace; but what do you wish me to understand by this? Are we to insist on preceding Sir George in going through a door?"

Grace blushed to the eyes, and yet she laughed involuntarily.

"What nonsense! No one thinks of such things in America."

"Except at Washington, where, I am told, senators' ladies do give themselves airs. But you are quite right, Grace; women have no rank in America beyond their general social rank as ladies or no ladies, and we will not be the first to set an example of breaking the rule. I am afraid our blood will pass for nothing, and that we must give place to the Baronet, unless, indeed, he recognises the rights of the sex."

"You know I mean nothing so silly. Sir George Templemore does not seem to think of rank at all; even Mr. Powis treats him in all respects as an equal, and Sir George seems to admit it to be right."

Eve's maid, at the moment, was twisting her hair, with the intention to put it up, but the sudden manner in which her young mistress turned to look at Grace, caused Annette to relinquish her grasp, and the shoulders of the beautiful and blooming girl were instantly covered again with the luxuriant tresses.

"And why should not Mr. Powis treat Sir George Templemore as one every way his equal, Grace?" she asked, with an impetuosity unusual in one so trained in the forms of the world.

"Why, Eve, one is a baronet, and the other is but a simple gentleman."

Eve Effingham sat silent for a minute. Her little foot moved, though she had been carefully taught that a lady-like manner required that even this beautiful portion of the female frame ought to be quiet and unobtrusive. But America did not contain two of the same sex, years, and social condition, less alike in their opinions, or it might be said their prejudices, than the two cousins. Grace Van Courtlandt, of the best blood of her native land, had unconsciously imbibed in childhood the notion connected with hereditary rank, through the traditions of colonial manners by means of novels, by hearing the vulgar reproached or condemned for their obtrusions and ignorance, and by the aid of her imagination, which contributed to throw a gloss and brilliancy over a state of things that singularly gains by distance. On the other hand, with Eve, everything connected with such subjects was a matter of fact. She had been thrown early into the highest associations of Europe; she had not only seen royalty on its days of gala and representation, a mere raree-show that is addressed to the senses, or purely an observance of forms that may possibly have their meaning, but which can scarcely be said to have their reasons, but she had lived long and intimately among the high-born and great; and this, too, in so many different countries as to have destroyed the influence of the particular nation that has transmitted so many of its notions to America as heir-looms. By close observation, she knew that arbitrary and political distinctions made but little difference between men of themselves, and so far from having become the dupe of the glitter of life by living so long within its immediate influence, she had learned to discriminate between the false and the real, to perceive that which was respectable and useful, and to know it from that which was merely arbitrary and selfish. Eve actually fancied that the position of an American gentleman might readily be,—nay, that it ought to be—the highest of all human stations, short of that of sovereigns. Such a man had no social superior in her eyes, with the exception of those who actually ruled; and this alone she conceived rendered him more than noble, as nobility is usually graduated. She had been accustomed to see her father and John Effingham moving in the best circles of Europe, respected for their information and independence, undistinguished by their manners, admired for their personal appearance; manly, courteous, and of noble bearing and principles, if not set apart from the rest of mankind by an arbitrary rule connected with rank; rich, and possessing all the habits that properly mark refinement; of gentle extraction, of liberal attainments, walking abroad in the dignity of manhood, and with none between them and the Deity. Eve therefore had learned to regard the gentlemen of her race as the equals of any of their European associates in station, and as the superiors of most in everything that is essential to true distinction. With her, even titular princes and dukes had no estimation merely as princes and dukes; and as her quick mind glanced over the long catalogue of artificial social gradations, and she found Grace actually attaching an importance to the equivocal and purely conventional station of an English baronet, a strong sense of the ludicrous connected itself with the idea.

"A simple gentleman, Grace!" she repeated slowly after her cousin: "and is not a simple gentleman—a simple American gentleman—the equal of any gentleman—of a poor baronet in particular?"

"Poor baronet, Eve!"

"Yes, dear, poor baronet; I know fully the extent and meaning of what I say. It is true we do not know as much of Mr. Powis's family"—and here Eve's colour heightened, though she made a mighty effort to be steady and unmoved—"as we might; but we know he is an American; that, at least, is something; and we see he is a gentleman; and what American gentleman, a real American gentleman, can be the inferior of an English baronet? Would your uncle, think you—would cousin Jack—proud, lofty-minded cousin Jack, think you, Grace, consent to receive so paltry a distinction as a baronetcy, were our institutions to be so far altered as to admit of such social classifications?"

"Why, what would they be, Eve, if not baronets!"

"Earls, counts, dukes,—nay, princes! These are the designations of the higher classes of Europe, and such titles, or those that are equivalent, would belong to the higher classes here."

"I fancy that Sir George Templemore would not be persuaded to admit all this!"

"If you had seen Miss Eve surrounded and admired by princes, as I have seen her, Miss Grace," said Anne Sidley, earnestly, "you would not think any simple Sir George half good enough for her."

"Our good Nanny means a Sir George," interrupted Eve, laughing, "and not the Sir George in question. But seriously, dearest coz, it depends more upon ourselves, and less on others, in what light they are to regard us, than is commonly supposed. Do you not know that there are families in America which, if disposed to raise any objections beyond those that are purely personal, would object to baronets and the wearers of red ribbons as unfit matches for their daughters, on the ground of rank? What an absurdity would it be for a Sir George, or the Sir George either, to object to a daughter of a President of the United States, for instance, on account of station; and yet, I'll answer for it, you would think it no personal honour, if Mr. Jackson had a son, that he should propose to my dear father for you. Let us respect ourselves properly, take care to be truly ladies and gentlemen, and so far from titular ranks being necessary to us, we shall before long bring all such distinctions into discredit by showing that they are not necessary to any one important interest, or to our true happiness and respectability."

"And do you not believe, Eve, that Sir George Templemore thinks of the difference in station between us?"

"I cannot answer for that," said Eve, carelessly. "The man is reasonably modest, and it is possible when he sees that we belong to the highest social condition of a great country, he may regret that such has not been his own good fortune in his native land; especially, Grace, since he has known you."

Grace blushed, looked pleased, delighted even, and yet surprised. It is unnecessary to explain the causes of the first three expressions of her emotions, but the last may require a short examination. Nothing but time, and a change of circumstances, can ever raise a province, or a provincial town, to the independent state of feeling that so strikingly distinguishes a metropolitan country or a capital. It would be as rational to expect that the tenants of the nursery should disregard the opinions of the drawing-room, as to believe that the provincial should do all his own thinking. It is not surprising, therefore, that Grace Van Courtlandt, with her narrow associations, general notions of life, origin, and provincial habits, should be the very opposite of Eve in all that relates to independence of thought, on subjects like those they were now discussing. Had Grace been a native of New England even, she would have been less influenced by the mere social rank of the baronet than was actually the case; for while the population of that part of the Union feels more of the general subserviency to Great Britain than the population of any other portion of the republic, it probably feels less of it in this particular form, from the circumstance that its colonial habits were less connected with the aristocratical usages of the mother country. Grace was allied by blood, too, with the higher classes of England, as indeed was the fact with most of the old families among the New York gentry, and the traditions of her race came in aid of the traditions of her colony, to continue the profound deference she felt for an English title. Eve might have been equally subjected to the same feelings, had she not been removed into another sphere at so early a period of life, where she imbibed the notions already mentioned—notions that were quite as effectually rooted in her moral system as those of Grace herself could be in her own.

"This is a strange way of viewing the rank of a baronet, Eve!"

Grace exclaimed, as soon as she had a little recovered from the confusion caused by the personal allusion. "I greatly question if you can induce Sir George Templemore to see his own position with your eyes."

"No, my dear, I think he will be much more likely to regard not only that, but most other things, with the eyes of another person. We will now talk of more agreeable things, however; for I confess, when I do dwell on titles, I have a taste for the more princely appellations, and that a simple chevalier can scarce excite a feeling —"

"Nay, Eve," interrupted Grace with spirit, "an English Baronet is noble; Sir George Templemore assured me of that as lately as last evening. The heralds, I believe, have recently established that fact to their own satisfaction."

"I am glad of it, dear," returned Eve, with difficulty refraining from gaping, "as it will be of great importance to them in their own eyes. At all events, I concede that Sir George Templemore, Knight or Baronet, big baron or little baron, or rag baron, as they call it in this country, is a noble fellow; and what more can any reasonable person desire! Do you know, sweet coz, that the Wigwam will be full to overflowing next week? — that it will be necessary to light our council fire, and to smoke the pipe of many welcomes?"

"I have learned from Mr. Powis, that his kinsman, Captain Ducie, will arrive on Monday."

"And Mrs. Hawker will come on Tuesday, Mr. and Mrs. Bloomfield on Wednesday, and honest, brave, straight-forward, literatifying, segar-smoking Captain Truck, on Thursday at the latest. We shall be a large country circle, and I hear the gentlemen talking of the boats and other amusements. But I believe my father has a consultation in the library at which he wishes us to be present, and we will now join him, if you please."

As Eve's toilette was completed, the two ladies rose, and descended together to join the party below. Mr. Effingham was standing at a table that was covered with maps, while two or three respectable-looking men, master mechanics, were at his side. The manners of these men were quiet, civil, and respectful, combining a mixture of manly simplicity with a proper deference for the years and station of the master of the house; and yet all but one wore their hats! The one who formed the exception had become refined by a familiar intercourse with this particular family; and this acquired taste had taught him that respect for himself, as well as for others, rendered it necessary that he should observe the long-established rules of decorum in his intercourse with society. His companions, though without a particle of coarseness, or any rudeness of intention, were less decorous, simply from a loose habit that is insensibly superseding the ancient laws of propriety in such matters, and the origin of which, it is to be feared, can be traced to certain false and impracticable political notions, that have been generated by the arts of crafty demagogues. Still, not one of these three hard-working, actually civil, and even humane men, who now stood covered in the library of Mr. Effingham, was probably conscious of the impropriety of which he was guilty; indeed, they were doing nothing more than insensibly yielding to a vicious and vulgar practice.

"I am glad you have come, my love," said Mr. Effingham, as his daughter entered the room, "for I find I need support in maintaining my own opinions here. John is obstinately silent, and as for all these other gentlemen, I fear they have decidedly taken part against me."

"You can usually count on my support, dearest father, feeble as it may be; but what is the disputed point to-day?"

"There is a proposition to alter the interior of the church, and our neighbour, Mr. Gouge, has brought the plans on which, as he says, he has lately altered several churches in the county. The idea is to remove the pews entirely, converting them into what are called 'slips,' to lower the pulpit, and to raise the floor, amphitheatre fashion."

"Can there be a sufficient reason for this change?" demanded Eve, with surprise. "Slips! the word has a vulgar sound even, and savours of a useless innovation. I doubt its orthodoxy."

"It is very popular, Miss Eve," answered Aristobulus, advancing from a window, where he had been whispering apart. "This fashion takes universally, and is beginning to prevail in all denominations."

Eve turned involuntarily, and to her surprise she perceived that the editor of the "Active Inquirer" was added to their party. The salutations on the part of the young lady were distant and stately, while Mr. Dodge, who had not been able to resist public opinion, and had actually parted with his mustachios, simpered, and wished to have it understood by the spectators that he was on familiar terms with all the family.

"It may be popular, Mr. Bragg," returned Eve, as soon as she arose from her profound curtesy to Mr. Dodge, "but it can scarcely be said to be seemly. This is, indeed, changing the order of things, by elevating the sinner and depressing the saint."

"You forget, Miss Eve, that under the old plan the people could not see; they were kept unnaturally down, if one can so express it, while nobody had a good look-out but the parson and the singers in the front row of the gallery. This was unjust."

"I do not conceive, sir, that a 'good look-out,' as you term it, is at all essential to devotion, or that one cannot as well listen to instruction when beneath the teacher as when above him."

"Pardon me, Miss,"—Eve recoiled, as she always did when Mr. Bragg used this vulgar and contemptuous mode of address,—
"we put nobody up or down; all we aim at is a just equality. We place all as nearly as possible on a level."

Eve gazed about her in wonder, and then she hesitated a moment, as if distrusting her ears.

"Equality!—equality with what? Surely not with the ordained ministers of the church in the performance of their sacred duties!—surely not with the Deity!"

"We do not look on it exactly in this light, ma'am. The people build the church; that you will allow, Miss Effingham,—even you will allow this, Mr. Effingham."

Both the parties appealed to bowed a simple assent to so plain a proposition, but neither spoke.

"Well, the people building the church very naturally ask themselves for what purpose it was built?"

"For the worship of God," returned Eve, with a steady solemnity, that a little abashed even the ordinarily indomitable and self-satisfied Aristobulus.

"Yes, Miss, for the worship of God and the accommodation of the public."

"Certainly," added Mr. Dodge, "for the public accommodation and for public worship," laying an emphasis on the adjective in both cases.

"Father, you, at least, will never consent to this!"

"Not readily, my love. I confess it shocks all my notions of propriety to see the sinner, even when he professes to be the most humble and penitent, thrust himself up ostentatiously, as if filled with his own self-love and self-importance."

"You will allow, Mr. Effingham," rejoined Aristobulus, "that churches are built to accommodate the public, as Mr. Dodge has so well remarked."

"No, sir; they are built for the worship of God, as my daughter has so well remarked."

"Yes, sir, that too, I grant you."

"For the public convenience also, as secondary to the main object, Mr. Bragg unquestionably means," observed John Effingham, speaking for the first time that morning on the subject, and with his usual point.

Eve turned round quickly, and looked towards her kinsman. He was standing near the table with folded arms, while his fine face expressed all the sarcasm and contempt that a countenance so singularly calm and gentlemanlike could betray.

“Cousin Jack,” she said earnestly, “this ought not to be!”

“Cousin Eve, nevertheless, this will be.”

“Surely not—surely not! men can never so far forget appearances as to convert the temple of God into a theatre, in which the convenience of the spectators is the one great object to be kept in view!”

“You have travelled, sir,” said John Effingham, indicating by his eye that he addressed Mr. Dodge in particular, “and must have entered places of worship in other parts of the world. Did not the simple beauty of the manner in which all classes, the great and the humble, the rich and the poor, kneel in a common humility before the altar, strike you agreeably on such occasions, in Catholic countries in particular?”

“Bless me, no, Mr. John Effingham. I was disgusted with the meannesses of their rites, and really shocked at the abject manner in which the people knelt on the cold damp stones, as if they were no better than beggars.”

“And were they not beggars?” asked Eve, with almost a severity of tone. “Ought they not so to consider themselves when petitioning for mercy from the one great and omnipotent God?”

“Why, Miss Effingham, the people will rule, and it is useless to pretend to tell them that they shall not have the highest seats in the church, as well as in the state. Really, I can see no ground why a parson should be raised above his parishioners. The new-order churches consult the public convenience, and place everybody on a level, as it might be; now, in old times, a family was buried in its pew; it could neither see nor be seen, and I can remember when I could just get a look of our clergyman’s wig; for he was an old school man, and, as for fellow creatures, one might as well be praying in his own closet. I must say I am a supporter of liberty, if it be only in pews.”

“I am sorry, Mr. Dodge,” answered Eve, more mildly, “you did not extend your travels into the countries of the Mussulmans, where most Christian sects might get some useful notions concerning that part of worship, at least, that is connected with appearances. There you would have seen no seats, but sinners bowing down in a mass on the cold stones, and all thoughts of cushioned pews and drawing-room conveniences unknown. We Protestants have not improved on our Catholic forefathers in this respect, and the innovation of which you now speak, in my eyes, is an irreverent, almost a sinful invasion, of the properties of the temple.”

“Ah, Miss Eve, this comes from substituting forms for the essence of things!” exclaimed the editor. “For my part, I can say I was truly shocked with the extravagances I witnessed in the way of worship in most of the countries I visited. Would you think it, Mr. Bragg,—rational beings, real bonâ fide living men and women, kneeling on the pavements like so many camels in the desert ready to receive the burthens of their masters?”—Mr. Dodge loved to draw his images from the different parts of the world he had seen.—“Not a pew, not a cushion, not a single comfort that is suitable to a free and intelligent being, but everything conducted in the most abject manner, as if accountable human souls were no better than so many mutes in a Turkish palace.”

“You ought to mention this in the ‘Active Inquirer,’” said Aristobulus.

“All in good time, sir; I have many things in reserve, among which I propose to give a few remarks—I dare say they will be very worthless ones—on the impropriety of a rational being ever kneeling. To my notion, gentlemen and ladies, God never intended an American to kneel.”

The respectable mechanics who stood around the table did not absolutely assent to this proposition, for one of them actually remarked, that “he saw no great harm in a man’s kneeling to the Deity,” but they evidently inclined to the opinion that the new school of pews was far better than the old.

“It always appears to me, Miss Effingham,” said one, “that I hear and understand the sermon better in one of the low pews, than in one of the old high-back things that look so much like pounds.”

“But can you withdraw into yourself better, sir?—Can you more truly devote all your thoughts with a suitable singleness of heart to the worship of God?”

“You mean in the prayers now, I rather conclude?”

“Certainly, sir, I mean in the prayers and thanksgivings.”

“Why, we leave them pretty much to the parson; though, I will own that it is not quite as easy leaning on the edge of one of the new-school pews as on one of the old. They are better for sitting, but not so good for leaning; but then the sitting posture at prayers is quite coming into favour among our people, Miss Effingham, as well as among yours. The sermon is the main chance, after all.”

“Yes,” observed Mr. Gouge; “give me good stirring preaching any day in preference to good praying. A man may get along with second-rate prayers, but he stands in need of first-rate preaching.”

“These gentlemen consider religion a little like a cordial on a cold day," observed John Effingham, "which is to be taken in sufficient doses to make the blood circulate. They are not the men to be pounded in pews like lost sheep,—not they."

"Mr. John will always have his say," one remarked, and then Mr. Effingham dismissed the party by telling them he would think of the matter.

When the mechanics were gone, the subject was discussed at some length between those that remained, all the Effinghams agreeing that they would oppose the innovation as irreverent in appearance, unsuited to the retirement and self-abasement that best comported with prayer, and opposed to the delicacy of their own habits; while Messrs. Bragg and Dodge contended to the last, that such changes were loudly called for by the popular sentiment, that it was unsuited to the dignity of a man to be pounded even in a church, and, virtually, that a good stirring sermon, as they called it, was of far more account in public worship than all the prayers and praises that could issue from the heart or throat.

CHAPTER XIV.

"We'll follow Cade—we'll follow Cade."—MOB.

"The views of this Mr. Bragg, and of our old fellow-traveller, Mr. Dodge, on the subject of religious forms, appear to be peculiar," observed Sir George Templemore, as he descended the little lawn before the Wigwam, in company with the three ladies, Paul Powis, and John Effingham, on their way to the lake. "I should think it would be difficult to find another Christian who objects to kneeling at prayer."

"Therein you are mistaken, Templemore," answered Paul, "for this country, to say nothing of one particular sect which holds it in pious horror, is filled with such worshippers. Our worthy ancestors, like all neophytes, ran into extremes on the subject of forms, as well as in other matters. When you go to Philadelphia, Miss Effingham, you will see an instance of a most ludicrous nature—ludicrous, if there were not something painfully revolting mingled with it—of the manner in which men can strain at a gnat and swallow a camel, and which, I am sorry to say, is immediately connected with our own church."

It was music to Eve's ears to hear Paul Powis speak of his worthy ancestors "as having been Americans," and to find him so thoroughly identifying himself with her own native land; for, while condemning so many of its practices, and so much alive to its absurdities and contradictions, our heroine had seen too much of other countries not to take an honest pride in the real excellences of her own. There was also a soothing pleasure in hearing him openly own that he belonged to that church which she herself so deeply revered.

“And what is there so ridiculous in Philadelphia in particular, and in connection with our own church?” she asked. “I am not easily disposed to find fault when the venerable church is concerned.”

“You know that the Protestants, in their horror of idolatry, discontinued, in a great degree, the use of the cross as an outward religious symbol, and that there was probably a time when not a single cross could be seen in the whole of a country that was inhabited by those who made the profession of love for Christ, and a dependence on his expiation, the great business of their lives.”

“Certainly, we all know that our predecessors were a little over rigid and scrupulous on all the points connected with outward appearances.”

“They certainly contrived to render religious rites as little pleasing to the senses as possible, by aiming at a sublimation that peculiarly favours spiritual pride and a pious conceit. I do not know whether travelling has had the same effect on you as it has produced on me, but I find all my inherited antipathies to the mere visible representation of the cross superseded by a sort of solemn affection for it as a symbol, more particularly when it is plain, and unaccompanied by any of those bloody and minute accessories that are so often seen around it in Catholic countries. The German Protestants, who usually ornament the altar with a cross, first cured me of the disrelish I had imbibed for such things in childhood.”

“We also, I think, cousin John, were agreeably struck with the same usage in Germany. From feeling a species of nervousness at the sight of a cross I came to love to see it, and I think you must have undergone a similar change, for I have discovered no less than two among the ornaments of the great window of the entrance tower at the Wigwam.”

“You might have discovered one also in every door of the building, whether great or small, young lady. Our worthy ancestors, as Powis calls them, much of whose piety, by the way, was anything but ameliorated by spiritual humility or Christian charity, were such ignoramuses as to set up crosses in every door they built, even while they veiled their eyes in holy horror whenever the sacred symbol was seen in a church.”

“Every door!” exclaimed all the Protestants of the party.

“Yea, in every door, I might almost say; certainly in every panelled door that was constructed twenty years since. I first discovered the secret of our blunder when visiting a castle in France, that dated back the time of the crusades. It was a château of the Montmorencies, that had passed into the hands of the Condé family by marriage, and the courtly old domestic who showed me the curiosities, pointed out the stone crosses in the windows, which have caused the latter to be called croisées, as a pious usage of the crusaders. Turning to a door, I saw the same crosses in the wooden stiles, and if you cast an eye at the first humble door that you may pass in this village, you will detect the same symbol staring you boldly in the face, in the very heart of a population that would almost expire at the thought of placing such a sign of the beast, as they term it, on their threshold.”

The whole party expressed their surprise, but the first door they passed corroborated this account, and proved the accuracy of John Effingham's statements. Catholic zeal and ingenuity could not have wrought more accurate symbols of this peculiar sign of the sect, and yet here they stood staring every passenger in the face, as if mocking the ignorant and exaggerated pretension which would lay undue stress on the minor points of a religion, the essence of which was faith and humility.

“And the Philadelphia church,” said Eve quickly, so soon as curiosity was satisfied on the subject of the doors. “I am now more impatient than ever to learn what silly blunder we have also committed there.”

“Impious would almost be a better term,” Paul answered. “The only church spire that existed for half a century in that town is surmounted by a mitre, while the cross was studiously rejected!”

A silence followed, for there is often more true argument in simply presenting the facts of a case than in all the rhetoric and logic that could be urged in the way of auxiliaries. Every one saw the egregious folly, not to say presumption, of the mistake, and, at the moment, every one wondered how a common-sense community could have committed it. We are mistaken; there was one exception to the general feeling in the person of Sir George Templemore. To his church-and-state notions, and anti-catholic prejudices, which were quite as much political as religious, there was everything that was proper, and nothing that was wrong, in rejecting a cross for a mitre.

“The church, no doubt, was Episcopal, Powis,” he remarked; “and if it was not Roman, what better symbol than the mitre could be chosen?”

"Now I reflect, it is not so very strange," said Grace hastily, "for you will remember, Mr. Effingham, that Protestants attach the idea of idolatry to the cross, as it is used by Catholics."

"And of bishops, peers in Parliament, church and state, to a mitre!"

"Yes, but the church in question I have seen, and it was erected before the war of the revolution; it was an English rather than an American church."

"It was indeed an English rather than an American church, and Templemore is very right to defend it, mitre and all."

"I dare say a bishop officiated at its altar?"

"I dare say—nay, I know he did, and I will add, he would rather that the mitre were two hundred feet in the air than down on his own simple, white-haired, apostolical looking head. But enough of divinity for the morning; yonder is Tom with the boats—let us to our oars."

The party were now on the little rude wharf that served as a village landing, and the boatman referred to lay off, in waiting for the arrival of his fare. Instead of requiring his services however, the man was dismissed, the gentlemen preferring to handle the oars themselves. Aquatic excursions were of constant occurrence in the warm months on that beautifully limpid sheet of water, and it was the practice to dispense with the regular boatmen whenever good oarsmen were to be found among the company.

As soon as the light buoyant skiff was brought to the side of the wharf, the whole party embarked; when Paul and the baronet, taking the oars, by dint of vigorous exertion, soon urged the boat from the shore.

"This world is really getting to be too confined for the adventurous spirit of the age," said Sir George, as he and his companion pulled leisurely along, taking the direction of the eastern shore, beneath the forest-clad cliffs, towards which the ladies had expressed a wish to be rowed: "here are Powis and myself actually rowing together on a mountain lake of America, after having boated as companions on the coast of Africa and on the margin of the great Desert. Polynesia and Terra Australia may yet see us in company as hardy cruisers."

"The spirit of the age is, indeed, working wonders in the way you mean," said John Effingham. "Countries of which our fathers merely read are getting to be as familiar as our own houses to their sons; and, as you justly observe, one can hardly foresee to what a pass of adventure the generation or two that will follow us may not reach."

"Vraiment, c'est fort extraordinaire de se trouver sur un lac Américain!" exclaimed Mademoiselle Vieffville.

“More extraordinary than to find one’s self on a Swiss lake, think you, my dear Viefville?”

“Non, non; mais tout aussi extraordinaire pour une Parisienne!”

“I am now about to introduce you,—Mr. John Effingham and Miss Van Courtlandt excepted,”—Eve continued, “to the wonders and curiosities of our lake and region. There, near the small house that is erected over a spring of delicious water, stood the hut of Natty Bumppo, once known throughout all these mountains as a renowned hunter, a man who had the simplicity of a woodsman, the heroism of a savage, the faith of a Christian, and the feelings of a poet. A better than he, after his fashion, seldom lived.”

“We have all heard of him,” cried the baronet, looking round curiously, “and must feel an interest in what concerns so brave and just a man. I would I could see his counterpart.”

“Alas!” said John Effingham, “the days of the ‘Leatherstockings’ have passed away. He preceded me in life, and I see few remains of his character in a region where speculation is more rife than morality, and emigrants are more plentiful than hunters. Natty probably chose that spot for his hut on account of the vicinity of the spring; is it not so, Miss Effingham?”

“He did; and yonder little fountain that you see gushing from the thicket, and which comes glancing like diamonds into the lake, is called ‘Fairy Spring’ by some flight of poetry that, like so many of our feelings, must have been imported, for I see no connection between the name and the character of the country, fairies having never been known, even by tradition, in Otsego.”

The boat now came under a shore where the trees fringed the very water, frequently overhanging the element that mirrored their fantastic forms. At this point a light skiff was moving leisurely along in their own direction, a short distance in advance. On a hint from John Effingham, a few vigorous strokes from the oars brought the two boats near each other.

“This is the flag-ship,” half whispered John Effingham, as they came near the other skiff, “containing no less a man than the ‘Commodore.’ Formerly, the chief of the Lake was an Admiral, but that was in a time when, being nearer to the monarchy, we retained some of the European terms; but now no man rises higher than a Commodore in America, whether it be on the ocean or on the Otsego, whatever may be his merits or his services.—A charming day, Commodore. I rejoice to see you still afloat, in your glory.”

The Commodore, a tall, thin, athletic man of seventy, with a white head, yet in his movements as active as a boy, had scarcely glanced at the approaching boat before he was thus saluted by the well-known voice of John Effingham. He now turned his head, however, and scanning the whole party through a pair of spectacles, he smiled good-naturedly, made a flourish with one hand, while he continued paddling with the other, for he stood erect and straight in the stern of his skiff, and answered heartily—

“A fine morning, Mr. John, and the right time of the moon for boating. This is not a real scientific day for the fish perhaps, but I have just come out to see that all the points and bays are in their right places.”

“How is it, Commodore, that the water near the village is less limpid than common, and that even up here we see so many specks floating on its surface?”

“What a question for Mr. John Effingham to ask on his native water! So much for travelling in far countries, where a man forgets quite as much as he learns, I fear.” Here the Commodore turned round, and raising an open hand in an oratorical manner, he added,—“You must know, ladies and gentlemen, that the lake is in blow.”

“In blow, Commodore! I did not know that the water had its blossoms like the plants.”

“It does, sir, nevertheless; ay, Mr. John, and its fruits too; but the last must be dug for by those who have the knack. There have been no miraculous draughts of fishes of late years in the Otsego, ladies and gentlemen; but it needs the scientific touch and the knowledge of baits to get a fin of any of your true game above the water, now-a-days. Well, I have had the head of the sogdollager thrice in the open air in my time, though I am told the Admiral actually got hold of him once with his hand.”

“The sogdollager!” said Eve, much amused with the singularities of the man, whom she perfectly remembered to have been commander of the lake, even in her own infancy; “we must be indebted to you for an explanation of that term, as well as for the meaning of your allusions to the head and to the open air.”

“A sogdollager, young lady, is the perfection of a thing. I know Mr. Grant, when he was alive, used to say there was no such word in the dictionary; but then there are many words that ought to be in the dictionaries, which have been forgotten by the printers. In the way of salmon-trout, the sogdollager is their commodore. Now, ladies and gentlemen, I should not like to tell you all I know about the patriarch of this lake, for you would scarcely believe me; but if he would not weigh a hundred when cleaned, there is not an ox in the country that will weigh a pound on its legs!”

“You say you have had his head above water?” said John Effingham.

“Thrice, Mr. John; the first time was thirty years ago; and I confess I lost him on that occasion by want of science, for the art is not learned in a day. I had then followed the business only for ten years. The second time was five years later, and I had then been fishing expressly for the old gentleman about a month. For near a minute it was a matter of dispute between us whether he should come out of the lake, or I go into it; but I actually got his gills in plain sight. That was a glorious haul! Washington did not feel better the night Cornwallis surrendered, than I felt on that great occasion!”

“One never knows the feelings of another, it seems. I should have thought disappointment at the loss would have been the prevailing sentiment on that great occasion, as you so justly term it.”

“So it would have been, Mr. John, with an unscientific fisherman, but we experienced hands know better. Glory is to be measured by quality, and not by quantity, ladies and gentlemen; and I look on it as a greater feather in a man’s cap, to see the sogdollager’s head above water for half a minute than to bring home a skiff filled with pickerel. The last time I had a look at the old gentleman, I did not try to get him into the boat, but we sat and conversed for nearly two minutes, he in the water and I in the skiff.”

“Conversed!” exclaimed Eve, “and with a fish too!—What could the animal have to say?”

“Why, young lady, a fish can talk as well as one of ourselves: the only difficulty is to understand what he says. I have heard the old settlers say, that the Leather-stocking used to talk for hours at a time with the animals of the forest, and even with the trees.”

“You knew the Leather-stocking Commodore?”

“No, young lady, I am sorry to say I never had the pleasure of looking at him, even. He was a great man! They may talk of their Jeffersons and Jacksons, but I set down Washington and Natty Bumppo as the two only really great men of my time.”

“What do you think of Bonaparte, Commodore?” inquired Paul.

“Well, sir, Bonaparte had some strong points about him, I do really believe; but he would have been nothing to the Leather-stocking in the woods! It’s no great matter, young gentlemen, to be a great man among your inhabitants of cities,—what I call umbrella people. Why, Natty was almost as great with the spear as with the rifle, though I own I never heard that he got a sight of the sogdollager.”

“We shall meet again this summer, Commodore,” said John

Effingham ; " the ladies now wish to hear the echoes, and we must leave you."

" All very natural, Mr. John," returned the Commodore laughing, and again flourishing his hand in his own peculiar manner. " The women all love to hear these echoes, for they are not often satisfied with what they have once said, but like to have it over again. I never knew a lady come on the Otsego water, but one of the first things she did was to get paddled up to the Speaking Rocks, to have a chat with herself. They come out in great numbers sometimes, and then all talk at once, in a way to confuse the echo. I suppose you have heard, young lady, the opinion people have now got concerning these voices?"

" I cannot say I have ever heard more than that they are some of the most perfect echoes known," answered Eve, turning round so as to face the old man, while the skiff of the party passed that of the veteran fisherman.

" Some people maintain there is no such thing as an echo at all, and that the sounds we hear come from the spirit of the Leatherstocking, which keeps about its old haunts, and repeats everything we say, in mockery of our ignorance, and as a taunt for our invasion of the woods. I do not say this notion is true, or that it is my own ; but we all know that Natty did dislike to see a new settler arrive in the mountains, and that he loved a tree as much as a musk-rat loves water. They show a tree up here on the side of the Vision, which he notched at every new comer until it reached seventeen, when his honest old heart could go no farther, and he gave the matter up in despair."

" This is so poetical, Commodore, that it is a pity it cannot be true. I like this explanation of the mystery of the ' Speaking Rocks' much better than that implied by the name of ' Fairy Spring.' "

" You are quite right, young lady," exclaimed the fisherman, as the boats separated still further ; " there never was any fairy known in Otsego ; but the time has been when we could boast of a Natty Bumppo."

Here the Commodore flourished his hand again, and Eve nodded her adieu. The skiff of the party continued to pull slowly along the fringed shore, occasionally sheering more into the lake to avoid some overhanging and nearly horizontal tree, and then returning so closely to the land as barely to clear the pebbles of the narrow strand with the oar. Eve thought she had never beheld a more wild or beautifully variegated foliage than that which the whole leafy mountain-side presented. More than half of the forest of tall, solemn pines, that had veiled the earth when the country was first settled, had already disappeared ; but, agreeably to one of those unintelligible laws by which Nature governs all things, a vigorous second-growth, that included nearly every variety of the American woods, had shot up in their places. The rich Rembrandt-like young hemlocks, in particular, were perfectly beautiful, contrasting with the livelier tints of the various deciduous trees. Here and there some flowering shrub rendered the picture gay, while masses of the rich chestnut, in blossom, lay in clouds of natural glory among the dark tops of the pines.

The gentlemen pulled the light skiff fully a mile under this overhanging foliage, occasionally frightening some migratory bird from a branch, or a water-fowl from the narrow strand. At length John Effingham desired them to cease rowing, and managing the skiff for a minute or two with the paddle with which he had been steering, he desired the whole party to look up, announcing to them that they were beneath the "silent pine."

A common exclamation of pleasure succeeded the upward glance, for it is seldom that any tree is seen to more advantage than that which immediately attracted every eye. The pine stood on the bank, with its roots embedded in the earth, a few feet higher than the level of the lake, but in such a situation as to bring the distance above the water into the apparent height of the tree. Like all of its kind that grow in the dense forests of America, its size had been increasing for a thousand years, and it now stood in solitary glory, a memorial of what the mountains, which were yet so rich in vegetation, had really been in their days of pride. For nearly a hundred feet above the eye the even round trunk was branchless, and then commenced the dark green masses of foliage, which clung around the stem like smoke when ascending in wreaths. The tall column-like tree had inclined towards the light, when struggling among its fellows, and it now so far overhung the lake, that its summit may have been some ten or fifteen feet without the base. A gentle graceful curve added to the effect of this variation from the perpendicular, and combined just enough of the fearful with the grand to render the picture sublime. Although there was not a breath of wind on the lake, the currents were sufficiently strong above the forest to move this lofty object, and it was possible to detect a slight, graceful yielding of the very uppermost boughs to the passing air.

"This pine is ill named," said Sir George Templemore, "for it is the most eloquent tree eye of mine has ever looked on!"

"It is indeed eloquent," answered Eve; "one hears it speak even now of the fierce storms that have raged around its top, of the seasons that have passed since it extricated that verdant cap from the throng of sisters that grew beneath it, and of all that has passed on the Otsego water, when this limpid lake lay a gem embedded in the forest. When the Conqueror first landed in England, this tree stood on the spot where it now stands! Here, then, is at least an American antiquity!"

"A true and regulated taste, Miss Effingham," said Paul, "has pointed out to you one of the real charms of the country. Were we to think less of our artificial, and more of our natural excellences, we should render ourselves less liable to criticism."

Eve was never inattentive when Paul spoke, and her colour heightened as he paid this compliment to her taste, but still her soft blue eye was riveted on the pine.

"Silent it may be in one respect, but it is indeed all eloquence in another," she resumed, with a fervour that was not lessened by Paul's remark. "That little crest of verdure, which resembles a plume of feathers, speaks of a thousand things to the imagination."

"I have never known a person of any poetry come under this tree," said John Effingham, "without falling into this very train of thought. I once brought a man celebrated for his genius here, and after gazing intensely for a minute or two at the high green tuft that tops the tree, he exclaimed, 'That mass of green waved in the fierce light when Columbus first ventured into the unknown sea!' It is, indeed, an eloquent tree, for it tells the same glowing tale to all who approach it—a tale fraught with feeling and recollections."

"And yet its silence is, after all, its eloquence," added Paul; "and the name is not so misapplied as one might at first think."

"It has probably obtained its name from some fancied contrast to the garrulous rocks that lie up yonder, half concealed by the forest. If you will ply the oars, gentlemen, we will now hold a little communion with the spirit of the Leather-stocking."

The young men complied, and in about ten minutes the skiff was pulled off into a situation, at the distance of fifty rods from the shore, where the whole mountain side was at one glance exposed to view. Here they lay on their oars, and John Effingham called out to the rocks a "good morning" in a clear, distinct voice. The mocking sounds were thrown back with such a marked resemblance and clearness of tone as actually startled the novices. Then followed other calls, and other repetitions of the echoes, in which the latter did not lose the most minute intonation of the voice.

"This actually surpasses the celebrated echoes of the Rhine," cried the delighted Eve; "for though those give the strains of the bugle so clearly, I do not think they answer to the voice with so much fidelity."

"You are very right, Eve," replied her kinsman; "I can recall no place where so perfect and accurate an echo is to be heard as at these Speaking Rocks. By increasing our distance to half a mile, and using a bugle, as I well know from actual experiment, we should get back entire passages of an air. The interval between the sound and the echo, too, would be distinct, and would give time for our undivided attention. Whatever may be said of the pine, these rocks are aptly named, and if the spirit of Leatherstocking has any concern with the matter, his is, indeed, amocking spirit."

John Effingham now looked at his watch, and then explained to the party a pleasure he had in store for them. On a sort of small public promenade that lay at the point where the river flowed out of the lake, stood a rude shell of a building that was called the "gunhouse." Here, a speaking picture of the entire security of the country from foes within as well as from foes without, were kept two or three pieces of artillery, with doors so open that any one might enter the building, or even use the guns at will, although they properly belonged to an organized corps of the state. One of these guns had been sent a short distance down the valley, and John Effingham informed his companions that they might momentarily expect its reports to arouse the slumbering echoes of the mountains. He was still speaking when the gun was fired, its muzzle being turned eastward. The sound first reached the side of the Vision abreast of the village, whence the reverberations reissued, and passed, rolling along the range, from cave to cave, cliff to cliff, and wood to wood, until they were lost like distant thunder, two or three leagues to the northward. The experiment was thrice repeated, and always with the same magnificent effect, the western mountains actually re-echoing the echoes of the eastern hills like the dying strains of some fearful music.

"Such a locality would be a treasure in the vicinity of a melodramatic theatre," said Paul, smiling, "for certainly no artificial thunder which I have ever heard has equalled this! A sheet of water like this might even receive a gondola."

"And I fear one accustomed to the boundless horizon of the ocean might in time weary of it," answered John Effingham significantly.

Paul protested earnestly to the contrary, and the party rowed away in silence.

"Yonder is the spot where we have so long been accustomed to resort for pic-nics," said Eve, pointing out a lovely point that was beautifully shaded by noble old oaks, and on which stood a rudely constructed house that was much dilapidated, and, indeed, injured by of the hands of man. John Effingham smiled as his cousin showed the place to her companions, promising them an early and a nearer view of its beauties.

"By the way, Miss Effingham," he said, "I suppose you flatter yourself with being the heiress of that desirable retreat?"

"It is very natural that, at some day, though I trust a very distant one, I should succeed to that which belongs to my dear father."

"Both natural and legal, my fair coz, but you are to learn there is a power that threatens to rise up and dispute your claims."

"What power—human power, at least, can dispute the lawful claims of an owner to his property? That point has been ours ever since civilized man has dwelt in these hills; who will presume to rob us of it?"

"You will be much surprised to discover that there is such a power, and that there is actually a disposition to exercise it. The public, the all-powerful, omnipotent, over-ruling, law-making, law-breaking public, has a passing caprice to possess itself of your beloved point, and Ned Effingham must show unusual energy to prevent the attainment of it."

"This can hardly be serious, cousin Jack?"

"As serious as the magnitude of the subject can render a responsible being, as Mr. Dodge would say."

Eve said no more, but she looked vexed, and remained silent until they landed, when she hastened to seek her father, with a view to communicate what she had just heard. Mr. Effingham listened to his daughter, as he always did, with tender interest, and when she had done, he kissed her glowing cheek, bidding her not to believe that as a possible occurrence which she seemed so seriously to dread.

"But cousin John would not trifle with me on such a subject, father," Eve continued. "He knows how much I prize all these little heir-looms that are connected with the affections."

"We can inquire further into the affair, my child, if it be your desire: ring for Pierre, if you please."

Pierre answered the bell, and a message was sent to Mr. Bragg, requiring his presence in the library. Aristobulus appeared by no means in the best humour, for he greatly disliked being omitted in the late excursion on the lake, fancying that he had a community-right to share in all his neighbours' amusements, though he had sufficient self-command to conceal his feelings.

"I wish to know, sir," Mr. Effingham commenced without introduction, "whether there can be any mistake concerning the ownership of the fishing point on the west side of the lake?"

“Certainly not, sir; it belongs to the public.”

Mr. Effingham's cheek glowed, and he looked astonished; but he remained calm.

“The public! Do you gravely affirm, Mr. Bragg, that the public pretend to claim that point?”

“Claim! Mr. Effingham; as long as I have resided in this county, I have never heard their right disputed.”

“Your residence in this county, sir, is not of very ancient date, and it is very possible that you may be mistaken. I feel some curiosity to know in what manner the public have acquired their title to the spot. You are a lawyer, Mr. Bragg, and may give an intelligible account of it.”

“Why, sir, your father gave it to them in his lifetime. Everybody, in all this region, will tell you as much as this.”

“Do you suppose, Mr. Bragg, there is anybody in all this region who will swear to that fact? Proof, you well know, is very requisite even to obtain justice.”

“I much question, sir, if there be anybody in all this region that will not swear to the fact. It is the common tradition of the whole county; and to be frank with you, sir, there is a little displeasure abroad, because Mr. John Effingham has talked of giving private entertainments on it.”

“This then only shows how idly and inconsiderately the traditions of the county take their rise. But, as I wish to understand all the points of the case, do me the favour to walk into the village, and inquire of those whom you think the best informed in the matter what they know of the Point, in order that I may regulate my course accordingly. Be particular, if you please, on the subject of title, as one would not wish to move in the dark.”

Aristobulus quitted the house immediately, and Eve, perceiving that things were in the right train, left her father alone to meditate on what had just passed. Mr. Effingham walked up and down his library for some time, much disturbed; for the spot in question was identified with all his early feelings and recollections, and if there were a foot of land on earth to which he was more attached than to all others, next to his immediate residence, it was this. He could not conceal from himself, moreover, in despite of his opposition to John Effingham's sarcasms, that his native country had undergone many changes since he last resided in it, and that some of them were evidently for the worse. The spirit of misrule was abroad, and the lawless and unprincipled had recourse to bold language when their object was intimidation. As he ran over in his mind, however, the facts of the case, and the nature of his right, he smiled to think that any one should contest it, and sat down to his writing, almost forgetting that there had been any question at all on the unpleasant subject.

Aristobulus was absent several hours, nor did he return until Mr. Effingham was dressed for dinner, and again alone in the library, having absolutely lost all recollection of the commission he had given his agent.

"It is as I told you, sir; the public insist that the Point is common property, and I feel it my duty to say, Mr. Effingham, that the public are determined to maintain their claim."

"Then, Mr. Bragg, it is proper I should tell the public that they are not the owners of the Point, but that I am its owner, and that I am determined to maintain my claim."

"It is hard to kick against the pricks, Mr. Effingham."

"It is so, sir, as will be shown, if the public persevere in invading a private right."

"Why, sir, some of those with whom I have conversed have gone so far as to desire me to tell you—I trust my motive will not be mistaken—"

"If you have any communication to make, Mr. Bragg, do it without reserve. It is proper that I should know the truth exactly."

"—Well, then, sir, I am the bearer of something like a defiance; the people wish you to know that they hold your right cheaply, and that they laugh at it. Not to mince matters, they defy you."

"I thank you for this frankness, Mr. Bragg, and it increases my respect for your character. Affairs are now at such a pass that it is necessary to act. If you will amuse yourself with a book for a moment, I shall have further occasion for your kindness."

Aristobulus did not read, for he was too much filled with wonder at seeing a man so coolly set about contending with that awful public, to which he himself as habitually deferred as an Asiatic slave defers to his monarch: indeed, nothing but his being sustained by that omnipotent power, for such he considered the power of the public to be, had emboldened him to speak so openly to his employer; for Aristobulus felt a secret confidence that, right or wrong, it was always safe in America to make the most fearless professions in favour of the great body of the community. In the mean time Mr. Effingham wrote a simple advertisement against trespassing on the property in question, and handed it to the other, with a request that he would have it inserted in the number of the village paper that was to appear next morning. Mr. Bragg took the advertisement, and went to execute the duty without comment.

The evening arrived before Mr. Effingham was again alone, when being by himself in the library once more, Mr. Bragg entered, quite full of his subject. He was followed by John Effingham, who had acquired some knowledge of what had taken place.

"I regret to say, Mr. Effingham," Aristobulus commenced, "that your advertisement has created one of the greatest sensations it has ever been my ill-fortune to witness in Templeton."

"All of which ought to be very encouraging to us, Mr. Bragg, as people acting under excited feelings are very liable to fall into error."

"Very true, sir, as regards individual excitements, but this is a public excitement."

"I am not at all aware that this fact in the least alters the case. If one excited man is apt to do silly things, half a dozen backers will be very likely to increase his folly."

Aristobulus listened with increasing wonder, for excitement was one of the means of effecting public objects, so much practised by men of his habits, that it had never crossed his mind that any single individual could be indifferent to its existence. To admit the truth, he had anticipated so much unpopularity from his unavoidable connection with this affair, as to have contributed himself in producing this very excitement, with the hope of "choking Mr. Effingham off," as he had elegantly expressed it to one of his intimates, in the vernacular language of the country.

"A public excitement is a powerful engine, Mr. Effingham," he exclaimed in a sort of politically pious horror.

"I am fully aware, sir, that it may be even a fearfully powerful engine. Excited men, acting in masses, compose what are commonly called mobs, and have committed a thousand excesses and crimes."

"Your advertisement is to the last degree disrelished; to be very sincere, it is awfully unpopular!"

"I suppose it is always what you term an unpopular act, so far as the individuals opposed are concerned, to resist aggression?"

"But they call your advertisement aggression, sir."

"In that simple fact exist all the merits of the question. If I am the rightful owner of this property, the public, or that portion of them which is connected with this affair, are aggressors; and so much the more in the wrong that they are many against one. If they can legally claim it, I am not only very wrong, but very indiscreet."

The calmness with which Mr. Effingham spoke had an effect on Aristobulus, and for a moment he was staggered. It was only for a moment, however, as the pains and penalties of unpopularity presented themselves afresh to his imagination, which had been so long accustomed to study popular caprice, that he ultimately considered the public favour as the one great good of life.

“But they affirm that they own the Point, Mr. Effingham.”

“And I say they do not own the Point, Mr. Bragg—never did own it—and, with my consent, never shall own it.”

“This is purely a matter of fact,” observed John Effingham, “and I confess I am curious to know how or whence this potent public derive their title. You are lawyer enough, Mr. Bragg, to know that the public can hold property only by use, or by especial statute. Now under which title does this claim present itself?”

“First by use, sir, and then by especial gift.”

“The use, you are aware, must be adverse, or as opposed to the title of the other claimants. Now I am a living witness that my late uncle permitted the public to use this Point, and that the public accepted the conditions. Its use, therefore, has not been adverse, or, at least, not for a time sufficient to constitute a title. Every hour that my cousin has permitted the public to enjoy his property, adds to his right, as well as to the obligation conferred on that public, and increases the duty of the latter to abandon their intrusion whenever he may desire it. If there is an especial gift, as I understand you to say, from my late uncle, there must also be a law to enable the public to hold the property, or a trustee : which is the fact?”

“I admit, Mr. John Effingham, that I have seen neither deed nor law, and I doubt if the latter exist. Still the public must have some claim, for it is impossible that everybody should be mistaken.”

“Nothing is easier, nor anything more common, than for entire communities to be mistaken, and the more particularly when they commence with ‘excitement.’”

While his cousin was speaking, Mr. Effingham went to a secretaire, and taking out a large bundle of papers, he laid it down on the table, and proceeded to unfold several parchment deeds, to which massive seals, bearing the arms of the late colony, as well as those of England, were appended.

“Here are my title deeds, sir,” he said, addressing Aristobulus pointedly; “if the public are in possession of better, let them be produced, and I shall at once submit to their claim.”

“No one doubts that the king, through his authorized agent, the governor of the colony of New York, granted this estate to your predecessor, Mr. Effingham, or that it descended legally to your immediate parent; but all contend that he voluntarily surrendered this spot to the community as a place of public resort.”

“I am glad that the question is narrowed down within limits that are so easily examined. What evidence is there of this intention on the part of my late father?"

"Common report; I have talked with twenty people in the village, and they all agree that the 'Point' has been used by the public, as public property, from time immemorial."

"Will you be so good, Mr. Bragg, as to name some of those who affirm this?"

Mr. Bragg complied, naming the number of persons he had mentioned with a readiness that proved he thought he was advancing testimony that could not easily be rebutted.

"Of all the names you have mentioned," returned Mr. Effingham, "I have only heard of three, and even these are the names of mere boys. The first dozen are certainly the names of persons who can know no more of this village than they have gleaned during the last few years, and several of them, I understand, have dwelt among us only for a few weeks—nay, days."

"Have I not told you, Ned," interrupted John Effingham, "that an American 'always' means eighteen months, and that 'time immemorial' is only since the last general crisis in the money market?"

"The persons I have mentioned compose a part of the population, sir," added Mr. Bragg, "and, one and all, they are ready to swear that your father, by some means or other,—they are not very particular as to minutiae,—gave them the right to use this property."

"They are mistaken, and I should be sorry that any one among them should swear to any such falsehood. But here are my deeds; let them show a better title, or, if they can, any."

"Perhaps your father abandoned the place to the public; this might make a good claim."

"That he did not, I am living proof to the contrary; he left it to his heirs at his death, and I myself exercised full right of ownership over it until I went abroad. I did not travel with it in my pocket, sir, it is true; but I left it to the protection of the laws, which I trust are as available to the rich as to the poor, although this is a free country."

"Well, sir, I suppose a jury must determine the point, as you seem firm; though I warn you, Mr. Effingham, as one who knows his country, that a verdict, in the face of a popular feeling, is rather a hopeless matter. If they prove that your late father intended to abandon, or to give this property to the public, your case will be lost."

Mr. Effingham examined the papers for a moment, and selecting one, he handed it to Mr. Bragg, first pointing out to his notice a particular paragraph.

"This, sir, is my late father's will," said Mr. Effingham mildly; "and in that particular clause you will find he makes an especial devise of this very Point, leaving it to his heirs in such terms as to put any intention to give it to the public quite out of the question. This, at least, is the latest evidence which I, his only son, executor, and heir, possess of his final wishes; if that wandering and time-immemorial public, of which you speak, has a better, I wait with impatience that it may be produced."

The composed manner of Mr. Effingham had deceived Aristobulus, who did not anticipate any proof so completely annihilating to the pretension of the public as that he now held in his hand. It was a simple, brief devise, disposing of the piece of property in question, and there could be no dispute that Mr. Effingham had succeeded to all the rights of his father, with no reservation or condition of any sort.

"This is very extraordinary," exclaimed Mr. Bragg, when he had read the clause several times, each perusal contributing to make the case still clearer in favour of his employer, the individual, and still stronger against the hoped for future employer, the people. "The public ought to have known of this bequest of the late Mr. Effingham."

"I think they ought, before they pretended to deprive his child of his property; or, rather, they ought to be certain, at least, that there was no such devise."

"You will excuse me, Mr. Effingham, but I think it is incumbent on a private citizen, in a case of this sort, when the public have taken up a wrong notion, as I now admit is clearly the fact as regards the Point, to enlighten them, and to inform them that they do not own the spot."

"This has been done already, Mr. Bragg, in the advertisement you had the goodness to carry to the printers, although I deny that there is any such obligation."

"But, sir, they object to the mode you have chosen to set them right."

"The mode is usual, I believe, in the case of trespasses."

"They expect something different, sir, in an affair in which the public is—is—is—all—"

"Wrong," put in John Effingham pointedly. "I have heard something of this out of doors, Ned, and blame you for your moderation. Is it true that you have told several of your neighbours that you have no wish to prevent them from using the Point, but that your sole object is merely to settle the question of right, and to prevent intrusions on your own family when it is enjoying its own place of retirement?"

"Certainly, John; my only wish is to preserve the property for those to whom it is especially devised, to allow those who have the best right to it its undisturbed possession occasionally, and to prevent any more of that injury to the trees which has been committed by some of those rude men, who always fancy themselves so completely all the public as to be masters in their own particular persons whenever the public has any claim. I can have no wish to deprive my neighbours of the innocent pleasure of visiting the Point, though I am fully determined they shall not deprive me of my property."

"You are far more indulgent than I should be, or perhaps than you will be yourself, when you read this."

As John Effingham spoke, he handed his kinsman a small hand-bill, which purported to call a meeting for that night of the inhabitants of Templeton, to resist his arrogant claim to the disputed property. This hand-bill had the usual marks of a feeble and vulgar malignity about it, affecting to call Mr. Effingham, "one Mr. Effingham," and it was anonymous.

"This is scarcely worth our attention, John," said Mr. Effingham mildly; "meetings of this sort cannot decide a title in law, and no man who respects himself will be the tool of so pitiful an attempt to frighten a citizen from maintaining his rights."

"I agree with you as respects the meeting, which has been conceived in ignorance and low malice, and will probably end, as all such efforts end, in ridicule. But—"

"Excuse me, Mr. John," interrupted Aristobulus, "there is an awful excitement! Some have even spoken of Lynching!"

"Then," said Mr. Effingham, "it does, indeed, require that we should be more firm. Do you, sir, know of any person who has dared to use such a menace?"

Aristobulus quailed before the stern eye of Mr. Effingham, and he regretted having communicated so much, though he had communicated nothing but the truth. He stammered out an obscure and half intelligible explanation, and proposed to attend the meeting in person, in order that he might be in the way of understanding the subject, without falling into the danger of mistake. To this Mr. Effingham assented, as he felt too indignant at this outrage on all his rights, whether as a citizen or as a man, to wish to pursue the subject with his agent that night. Aristobulus departed, and John Effingham remained closeted with his kinsman until the family had retired. During this long interview the former communicated many things to the latter, in relation to this very affair, of which the owner of the property until then had been profoundly ignorant.

CHAPTER XV.

"There shall be, in England, seven half-penny loaves sold for a penny : the three-hooped pot shall have ten hoops ; and I will make it felony to drink small beer : all the realm shall be in common, and in Cheapside shall my filly go to grass."—JACK CADE.

Though the affair of the Point continued to agitate the village of Templeton next day and for some time afterwards, it was little remembered in the Wigwam. Confident of his right, Mr. Effingham, though naturally indignant at the abuse of his long liberality, through which alone the public had been permitted to frequent the place, and this too often to his own discomfort and disappointment, had dismissed the subject temporarily from his mind, and was already engaged in his ordinary pursuits. Not so, however, with Mr. Bragg. Agreeably to promise he had attended the meeting, and now seemed to regulate all his movements by a sort of mysterious self-importance, as if the repository of some secret of unusual consequence. No one regarded his manner, however, for Aristobulus, and his secrets and opinions, were all of too little value in the eyes of most of the party to attract peculiar attention. He found a sympathetic listener in Mr. Dodge, that person having been invited, through the courtesy of Mr. Effingham, to pass a few days with those in whose company, though very unwillingly on the editor's part certainly, he had gone through so many dangerous trials. These two, then, soon became intimate, and any stranger who had witnessed their shrugs, significant whisperings, and frequent conferences in corners, might have fancied their shoulders burthened with the weightiest matters of state. But all this pantomime, which was intended to awaken curiosity, was lost on the company in general. The ladies, attended by Paul and the baronet, proceeded into the forest on foot for a morning's walk, while the two Messrs. Effingham continued to read with a most provoking indifference the daily journals that were received from town each morning. Neither Aristobulus nor Mr. Dodge could resist any longer, and after exhausting their ingenuity in the vain effort to induce one of the two gentlemen to question them concerning the meeting of the previous night, the desire to unburthen their minds fairly overcame their affected mysteriousness, and a formal request was made to Mr. Effingham to give them an audience in the library. The latter, who suspected the nature of the interview, requested his kinsman to make one of the party, and the four were soon alone in the apartment so often named.

Even now, that his own request for the interview was granted, Aristobulus hesitated about proceeding, until a mild intimation from Mr. Effingham that he was ready to hear his communication, told the agent that it was now too late to change his determination.

"I attended the meeting last night, agreeably to our arrangement, Mr. Effingham." Aristobulus commenced, "and I feel the utmost regret at being compelled to lay the result before a gentleman for whom I entertain so profound a respect."

"There was then a meeting?" said Mr. Effingham, inclining his body slightly by way of acknowledging the other's compliments.

"There was, sir, and I think, Mr. Dodge, we may say an overflowing one."

"The public were fairly represented," returned the editor, "as many as fifty or sixty having been present."

"The public have a perfect right to meet, and to take counsel on their claims to anything they may conceive themselves entitled to enjoy," observed Mr. Effingham. "I can have no possible objection to such a course, though I think they would have better consulted their own dignity had they insisted on being convoked by more respectable persons than those who, I understand, were foremost in this affair, and in terms better suited to their own sense of propriety."

Aristobulus glanced at Mr. Dodge, and Mr. Dodge glanced back at Mr. Bragg, for neither of these political mushrooms could form an adequate notion of the dignity and fair-mindedness with which a gentleman could view an affair of this nature.

"They passed a set of resolutions, Mr. Effingham," Aristobulus resumed, with the gravity with which he ever spoke of things of things of this nature; "a set of resolutions, sir!"

"That was to be expected," returned his employer, smiling; "the Americans are a set-of-resolutions-passing people. No three can get together without naming a chairman and secretary, and a resolution is as much a natural consequence of such an 'organization'—I believe that is the approved word—as an egg is the accompaniment of the cackling of a hen."

"But, sir, you do not yet know the nature of the resolutions!"

"Very true, Mr. Bragg; that is a piece of knowledge I am to have the pleasure of obtaining from you."

Again Aristobulus glanced at Steadfast, and Steadfast threw back the look of surprise, for to both it was matter of real astonishment that any man should be so indifferent to the resolutions of a meeting that had been regularly organized, with a chairman and secretary at its head, and which so unequivocally professed to be the public.

"I am reluctant to discharge this duty, Mr. Effingham, but as you insist on its performance it must be done. In the first place, they resolved that your father meant to give them the Point."

"A decision that must clearly settle the matter, and which will quite destroy all my father's own resolutions on the same subject. Did they stop at the Point, Mr. Bragg, or did they resolve that my father also gave them his wife and children?"

"No, sir; nothing was said concerning the latter."

"I cannot properly express my gratitude for their forbearance, as they had just as good a right to pass the one resolution as the other."

"The power of the public is awful, Mr. Effingham!"

"Indeed it is, sir, but fortunately that of the re-public is still more awful, and I shall look to the latter for support in this crisis—that is the favourite word, is it not Mr. John Effingham?"

"If you mean a change of administration, the upsetting of a stage, or the death of a cart-horse; they are all equally crises in the American vocabulary."

"Well, Mr. Bragg, having resolved that they knew my late father's intentions better than he knew them himself, as is apparent from the mistake he made in his will, what next did the public dispose of in the plenitude of their power?"

"They resolved, sir, that it was your duty to carry out the intentions of your father."

"In that, then, we are perfectly of a mind, as the public will most probably discover before we get through with this matter. This is one of the most pious resolutions I ever knew the public to pass. Did it proceed any further?"

Mr. Bragg, notwithstanding his long encouraged truckling to the sets of men whom he was accustomed to dignify with the name of the public, had a profound deference for the principles, character, and station of Mr. Effingham, that no sophistry or self-encouragement in the practices of social confusion could overcome; and he paused before he communicated the next resolution to his employer. But perceiving that both the latter and his cousin were waiting to hear it, he was fain to overcome his scruples, and to speak plainly.

"I am sorry to be obliged to add, Mr. Effingham," he said, "that the meeting resolved you had rendered yourself odious by your course in reference to the Point, and that it held you and your notice against trespasses in sovereign contempt."

"If I am to be deemed odious for claiming a right to control that which is my own," Mr. Effingham quietly remarked, "what is your public to be deemed for claiming to control that which is not their own?"

"Men will certainly regard this resolution with different eyes. I ventured to hint to the meeting that there might possibly be some mistake; but—"

"They resolved, as usual, that they were infallible," interrupted John Effingham, who had, with difficulty, kept silence to that moment. "You may regard this affair as you please, Ned, but in my eyes it is a deliberate perversion of truth, a violation of law, and a most indecent outrage on the rights of a citizen."

"Good Heavens! Mr. John; you forget these were the resolves" (Aristobulus was a Massachusetts man, and he preferred that Shaksperian term to the simpler word resolution,) "of a public meeting! a sacred public meeting."

John Effingham was about to answer with the cool contempt he really entertained for such an abuse of terms, when a gesture from his cousin induced him to continue silent.

"Will you have the goodness, Mr. Bragg," said the latter, "to give me some accurate notion of the composition of this meeting? Surely, Mr. Howel did not attend it?"

Aristobulus was obliged to confess he did not. Mr. Effingham then named some twenty or thirty of the more respectable and intelligent inhabitants of the village, including nearly every one who, by social position, age, or residence, could have a right to be active on such a question, and he found that not one of them all had been present. Surprised at the result, after the parade with which Mr. Bragg had introduced the subject of the meeting, he next inquired the names of those who had actually been foremost in the matter. By far the greater number were composed of that floating population which forms so large and so unsettled a part of most American communities, and some were actually residents of only a month's standing.

"These persons are mostly strangers to me," said Mr. Effingham, "and by their years, or their residence, can know little of the merits of the disputed question, and absolutely nothing of my father, who has now been dead nearly thirty years."

"They are, notwithstanding, the people, sir!"

"No, sir, they are not the people; and it is as impudent a pretension on their part to lay claim to be so considered as it is to lay claim to my property."

"It is enough that they consider themselves the people," said John Effingham, "to pretend to do anything. I trust, Ned, you do not mean to submit to this outrage?"

"What would you have me do, John, but pity those who are so grossly ignorant of propriety as to set themselves up as judges in their own cause? Certainly, I shall maintain to the letter my legal rights, and further than that I do not see anything is required of me. That much is now required even in behalf of the laws of our common country."

"But they have publicly expressed their contempt of you!"

"The surest possible sign they do not feel it. Contempt is a silent quality, and is never paraded before the world. No man is despised when it is thought necessary to make solemn and formal declarations to that effect. I hope by my conduct to show on which side the contempt really exists."

"They have openly libelled you by passing resolutions declaring you to be odious."

"That, indeed, is a strong measure, and for the interest of good manners and of good morals, it may call for a rebuke. No one can care less than myself, Mr. Bragg, for opinions the worthlessness of which is so clearly demonstrated by the heedless manner in which those who avow them have permitted themselves to fall into this error; but it is proceeding too far when a few members of the community presume to take these liberties with a private individual, and that, moreover, in a case affecting a pretended claim of their own; and I desire you will tell those concerned, that if they dare to publish their resolution declaring me to be odious, I will teach them what they now do not appear to know, that we live in a country of law. I shall not persecute them, but I shall indict them for the offence, and I hope this is plainly expressed."

Aristobulus stood aghast! To indict the public was a step he had never heard of before, and he began to perceive that the question actually had two sides. Still his awe of public meetings, and his habitual regard for popularity, induced him not to give up the matter without another struggle.

"They have already ordered their proceedings to be published, Mr. Effingham!" he said, as if such an order were not to be countermanded.

"I fancy, sir, that when it comes to the issue, and the pains and penalties of a prosecution present themselves, their leaders will begin to recollect their individuality, and to think less of their public characters. They who hunt in droves, like wolves, are seldom very valiant when singled out from their pack. The end will show."

"I heartily wish this unpleasant affair might be amicably settled," added Aristobulus. "It will make ill-blood, and an unpleasant neighbourhood."

"One might, indeed, fancy so," observed John Effingham, "since no man likes to be persecuted."

“But, Mr. John, the public think themselves persecuted in this case.”

“The term, as applied to a body that not only makes, but which executes the law, is so palpably absurd that I am surprised any man can presume to use it. But, Mr. Bragg, you have seen documents which must have thoroughly convinced you that the public have not the smallest right to this point of land.”

“All very true, sir; but you will please to remember that the people do not know what I now know.”

“And you will please to remember, sir, that when people choose to act affirmatively in as high-handed a manner as this, they are bound to know what they are about. Ignorance in such a matter is like the drunkard's plea of intoxication; it merely makes the offence worse.”

“Do you not think, Mr. John, that Mr. Effingham might have acquainted these citizens with the real state of the case? Are the people so very wrong because they have fallen into a mistake?”

“Since you ask this question plainly, Mr. Bragg, it shall be answered with equal sincerity. Mr. Effingham is a man of mature years, the known child, executor, and heir of one who, it is admitted all round, was the master of the controverted property. Knowing his own business, this Mr. Effingham, in sight of the grave of his fathers, beneath the paternal roof, has the intolerable impudence—”

“Arrogance is the word, Jack,” said Mr. Effingham, smiling.

“Ay, the intolerable arrogance to suppose that his own is his own, and this he dares to affirm without having had the politeness to send his title-deeds and private papers round to those who have been so short a time in the place that they might well know nothing of that which has occurred in it for the last half century. Oh, thou naughty, arrogant fellow, Ned!”

“Mr. John, you appear to forget that the public have more claim to be treated with attention than a single individual. If they have fallen into error they ought to be undeceived.”

“No doubt, sir; and I advise Mr. Effingham to send you, his agent, to every man, woman, and child in the country with the patent of the king, all the mesne conveyances and wills in your pockets, in order that you may read them at length to each individual, so that every man, woman, and child may be satisfied that he or she is not the owner of Edward Effingham's lands.!”

“Nay, sir, a shorter process might be adopted.”

“It might, indeed, sir; and such a process has been adopted by my cousin in giving the usual notice in the newspaper against trespassing. But, Mr. Bragg, you must know that I took great pains, three years since, when repairing this house, to correct the mistake on this very point into which I found that your immaculate public had fallen, through their disposition to know more of other people's affairs than those concerned knew of themselves."

Aristobulus said no more, but he gave the matter up in despair. On quitting the house, he proceeded forthwith to inform those who were most interested of the determination of Mr. Effingham not to be trampled on by any pretended meeting of the public. Common sense, not to say common honesty, began to resume its sway, and prudence put in its plea by way of applying the corrective. Both he and Mr. Dodge, however, agreed that there was an unheard-of temerity in thus resisting the people, and this, too, without a commensurate object, as the pecuniary value of the disputed Point was of no material consequence to either party.

The reader is not by any means to suppose that Aristobulus Bragg and Steadfast Dodge belonged to the same variety of the human species, in consequence of their unity of sentiment in this affair, and certain other general points of resemblance in their manner and modes of thinking. As a matter of necessity, each partook of those features of caste, condition, origin, and association that characterize their particular order; but when it comes to the nicer distinctions that mark true individuality, it would not have been easy to find two men more essentially different. The first was bold, morally and physically, aspiring, self-possessed, shrewd, singularly adapted to succeed in his schemes when he knew the parties, intelligent after his tastes, and apt. Had it been his fortune to be thrown earlier into a better sphere, the same natural qualities that rendered him so expert in his present situation would have conduced to his improvement, and most probably would have formed a gentleman, a scholar, and one who could have contributed largely to the welfare, principles, and tastes of his fellow-creatures. That such was not his fate was more his misfortune than his fault; for his plastic character had readily taken the impression of those things that from approximation alone pressed hardest on it. On the other hand, Steadfast was a hypocrite by nature, cowardly, envious, and malignant; and circumstances had only lent their aid to the natural tendencies of his disposition. That two men, so differently constituted at their births, should meet, as it might be, in a common centre, in so many of their habits and opinions, was merely the result of accident and education.

Among the other points of resemblance between these two persons, was the fault of confounding the cause with the effects of the peculiar institutions under which they had been educated and lived. Because the law gave to the public that authority which, under other systems, is intrusted either to one or to the few, they believed the public were invested with far more power than a right understanding of their own principles would have shown. In a word, both these persons made a mistake, which is becoming too common in America, that of supposing the institutions of the country were all means and no end. Under this erroneous impression, they saw only the machinery of the government, becoming entirely forgetful that the power which was given to the people collectively, was only so given to secure to them as perfect a liberty as possible in their characters of individuals. Neither had risen sufficiently above vulgar notions to understand that public opinion, in order to be omnipotent, or even formidable, beyond the inflictions of the moment, must be right, and that, if a solitary man renders himself contemptible by taking up false notions inconsiderately and unjustly, bodies of men, falling into the same errors, incur the same penalties, with the additional stigma of having acted as cowards.

There was also another common mistake into which Messrs. Bragg and Dodge had permitted themselves to fall, through the want of a proper distinction between principles. Resisting the popular will on the part of an individual, they considered arrogance and aristocracy per se, without at all entering into the question of the right or the wrong. The people, they rightly enough, in the general signification of the term, deemed to be sovereign; and they belonged to a numerous class, who view disobedience to the sovereign in a democracy, although it be in his illegal caprices, very much as the subject of a despot regards disobedience to his prince.

It is scarcely necessary to say, that Mr. Effingham and his cousin viewed these matters differently. Clear-headed, just-minded, and liberal in all his practices, the former, in particular, felt greatly annoyed by the recent occurrence, and he paced his library in silence for several minutes after Mr. Bragg and his companion had withdrawn, really too much grieved to speak.

"This is altogether a most extraordinary procedure, John," he at length observed, "and it strikes me that it is but an indifferent reward for the liberality with which I have permitted others to use my property these thirty years; often, very often, as you well know, to my own discomfort and to that of my friends."

"I have told you, Ned, that you were not to expect the America, on your return, that you left behind you on your departure for Europe. I am satisfied that no country has so altered for the worse in so short time."

"That unequalled pecuniary prosperity should sensibly impair the manners of what is termed the world, by introducing suddenly large bodies of uninstructed and untrained men and women into society, is a natural consequence of obvious causes; that it should corrupt morals, even, we have a right to expect; for we are taught to believe it the most corrupting influence under which men can live; but I confess I did not expect to see the day when a body of strangers, birds of passage, creatures of an hour, should assume a right to call on the old and long-established inhabitants of a country to prove their claims to their possessions, and this, too, in an unusual and unheard-of manner, under the penalty of being violently deprived of them!"

"Long-established!" repeated John Effingham, laughing: "what do you term long-established? Have you not been absent a dozen years, and do not these people reduce every thing to the level of their own habits? I suppose, now, you fancy you can go to Rome, or Jerusalem, or Constantinople, and remain four or five lustres, and then come coolly back to Templeton, and on taking possession of this house again, call yourself an old resident!"

"I certainly do suppose I have that right. How many English, Russians, and Germans did we meet in Italy,—the residents of years, who still retained all their natural and local rights and feelings?"

"Ay, that is in countries where society is permanent, and men get accustomed to look on the same objects, hear the same names, and see the same faces for their entire lives. I have had the curiosity to inquire, and I have ascertained that none of the old permanent families have been active in this affair of the Point, but that all the clamour has been made by those you call the birds of passage. But what of that? these people fancy everything reduced to the legal six months required to vote, and that rotation in persons is as necessary to republicanism as rotation in office."

"Is it not extraordinary that persons who know so little on the subject should be thus indiscreet and positive?"

"It is not extraordinary in America. Look about you, Ned, and you will see adventurers uppermost everywhere—in the government, in your towns, in your villages, in the country even: we are a nation of changes. Much of this, I admit, is the fair consequence of legitimate causes, as an immense region in forest cannot be peopled on any other conditions. But this necessity has infected the entire national character, and men become impatient of any sameness, even though it be useful. Everything goes to confirm this feeling, instead of opposing it. The constant recurrence of the elections accustoms men to changes in their public functionaries. The great increase in the population brings new faces, and the sudden accumulations of property place new men in conspicuous stations. The architecture of the country is not sufficiently respectable to render it desirable to preserve the buildings, without which we shall have no monuments to revere."

"You colour highly, Jack, and no picture loses in tints when retouched by you."

"Look into the first paper that offers, and you will see the young men of the country hardly invited to meet by themselves, to consult concerning public affairs, as if they were impatient of the counsels and experience of their fathers. No country can prosper where the ordinary mode of transacting business connected with the root of government commences with this gross impiety."

"This is a disagreeable feature in the national character certainly; but we must remember the arts employed by the designing to practise on the inexperienced."

"Had I a son, who presumed to denounce the wisdom and experience of his father in this disrespectful manner, I would disinherit the rascal."

"Ah, Jack! bachelors' children are notoriously well educated and well mannered. We will hope, however, that time will bring its changes also, and that one of them will be a greater constancy in persons, things, and the affections."

"Time will bring its changes, Ned, but all of them that are connected with individual rights, as opposed to popular caprice or popular interests, are likely to be in the wrong direction."

"The tendency is certainly to substitute popularity for the right, but we must take the good with the bad. Even you, Jack, would not exchange this popular oppression for any other system under which you have lived."

"I don't know that—I don't know that. Of all tyranny, a vulgar tyranny is to me the most odious."

"You used to admire the English system, but I think observation has lessened your particular admiration in that respect," said Mr. Effingham, smiling in a way that his cousin perfectly understood.

"Hark'e, Ned; we all take up false notions in youth, and this was one of mine; but of the two, I should prefer the cold, dogged domination of English law, with its fruits, to the heartlessness of a sophistication without a parallel, to being trampled on by every arrant blackguard that may happen to traverse this valley in his wanderings after dollars. There is one thing you yourself must admit; the public are a little too apt to neglect duties they ought to discharge, and to assume duties they have no right to fulfil." This remark, which was teeming with truth, ended the discourse.

CHAPTER XVI.

Her breast was a brave palace, a broad street,
Where all heroic ample thoughts did meet,
Where nature such a tenement had ta'en
That other souls, to hers, dwelt in a lane.

JOHN MORTON.

The village of Templeton, as has been already intimated, was a miniature town. Although it contained within the circle of its houses half a dozen residences with grounds, dignified with names, as has been said, it did not cover a surface of more than a mile square; that disposition to concentration, which is as peculiar to an American town as the disposition to diffusion is peculiar to the country population, and which seems almost to prescribe that a private dwelling shall have but three windows in front, and a façade of twenty-five feet, had presided at the birth of this spot as well as at the birth of so many of its predecessors and contemporaries.

In one of its more retired streets, (for Templeton had its publicity and retirement, the latter after a very village fashion, however,) dwelt a widow bewitched, of some small worldly means, who had five children, and a great capacity for circulating intelligence. Mrs. Abbot, for so was this demi-relict called, was just on the verge of what is termed the "good society" of the village, the most uneasy of all positions for an ambitious and ci-devant pretty woman to be placed in. She had not yet abandoned the hope of obtaining a divorce and its suites; was singularly nay, rabidly devout, if we may coin the adverb; in her own eyes she was perfection, in those of her neighbours slightly objectionable; and she was altogether a droll, but by no means a very unusual compound of piety, censoriousness, charity, proscription, gossip, kindness, meddling, ill-nature, and decency.

The establishment of Mrs. Abbot, like her house, was necessarily very small, and she kept no servant excepting a girl she called her help, a very suitable appellation by the way, as she and her mistress did most of the work of the ménage in common. This girl, in addition to her duties of cooking and washing, was the confidant of all her employer's wandering notions of mankind in general, and of her neighbours in particular, as often helping her mistress in circulating her comments on the latter as in anything else. Mrs. Abbot knew nothing of the Effinghams, except by a hearsay that got its intelligence from her own school, having herself but lately arrived at the place. She had selected Templeton as a residence on account of its cheapness; and having neglected to comply with the forms of the world by hesitating to make the customary visit to the Wigwam, she began to resent, in her spirit at least, Eve's delicate forbearance from obtruding where, agreeably to all usage, she had a perfect right to suppose she was not desired. It was in this spirit then that she sat conversing with Jenny, as the maid of all work was called, the morning after the conversation related in the last chapter, in her snug little parlour, sometimes plying her needle, and oftener thrusting her head out of a window which commanded a view of the principal street of the place, in order to see what her neighbours might be about.

"This is a most extraordinary course Mr. Effingham has taken concerning the Point," said Mrs. Abbot, "and I do hope the people will bring him to his senses. Why, Jenny, the public have used that place ever since I can remember, and I have now lived in Templeton quite fifteen months.—What can induce Mr. Howel to go so often to that barber's shop which stands directly opposite to the parlour window of Miss Bennett?—one would think the man was all beard."

"I suppose Mr. Howel gets shaved sometimes," said the logical Jenny.

"Not he; or if he does, no decent man would think of posting himself before a lady's window to do such a thing.—Orlando Furioso Samuel," calling to her eldest son, a boy of eleven,—“run over to Mr. Jones's store, and listen to what the people are talking about, and bring me back the news as soon as anything worth hearing drops from anybody; and stop as you come back, my son, and borrow neighbour Brown's gridiron. Jenny, it is 'most time to think of putting over the potatoes.”

"Ma'!" cried Orlando Furioso Samuel from the front door, for Mrs. Abbot was very rigid in requiring that all her children should call her "Ma'," being so much behind the age as actually not to know that "mother" had become much the genteeler term of the two,—“Ma'," roared Orlando Furioso Samuel, "suppose there is no news at Mr. Jones's store?"

"Then go to the nearest tavern; something must be stirring this fine morning, and I'm dying to know what it can possibly be. Mind you bring something besides the gridiron back with you, Fury, or never come home again as long as you live! As I was saying, Jenny, the right of the public (which is our right, for we are a part of the public,) to this Point, is as clear as day, and I am only astonished at the impudence of Mr. Effingham in pretending to deny it. I dare say his French daughter has put him up to it. They say she is monstrous arrogant !”

“Is Eve Effingham French ?” said Jenny, studiously avoiding any of the usual terms of civility and propriety, by way of showing her breeding. “Well, I had always thought her nothing but Templeton born !”

“What signifies where a person was born ; where they live is the essential thing, and Eve Effingham has lived so long in France that she speaks nothing but broken English, and Miss Delby told me last week that, in drawing up a subscription paper for a new cushion to the reading desk of her people, she actually spelt ‘charity’ ‘carrotty.’”

“Is that French, Mrs. Abbot ?”

“I rather think it is, Jenny ; the French are very niggardly, and give carrots to their poor to live on, and so they have adopted the word, I suppose. You, Byansy Alzummy Anne (Bianca Alzuma Anne) !”

“Marm !”

“Byansy Alzummy Anne, who taught you to call me marm ! Is this the way you have learned your catechism ! Say ‘ma,’ instantly.”

“Ma’.”

“Take your bonnet,”—this word, by way of brevity, Mrs. Abbot chose to call bunnet,—“take your bonnet, my child, and run down to Mrs. Wheaton’s, and ask her if any thing new has turned up about the Point this morning ; and, do you hear, Byansy Alzummy Anne Abbot,—how the child starts away, as if she were sent on a matter of life and death !”

“Why, ma’, I want to hear the news, too.”

“Very likely, my dear ; but, by stopping to get your errand, you may learn more than by being in such a hurry. Step in at Mrs. Green’s, and ask how the people liked the lecture of the strange parson last evening, and beg her, if she can, to lend me a watering pot. Now run, and be back as soon as possible. Never loiter when you carry news, child.”

“No one has a right to stop the mail, I believe Mrs. Abbot ?” said Jenny, very appositely.

“That, indeed, have they not, or else we could not calculate the consequences. You may remember, Jenny, the pious even had to give up that point, public convenience being too strong even for religion. Roger Demetrius Benjamin !” calling to a second boy, two years younger than his brother,—“your eyes are better than mine,—who are all those people collected together in the street ? Is not Mr. Howel among them ?”

"I do not know, ma'," answered Roger Demetrius Benjamin, gaping.

"Then run this minute and see, and don't stop to look for your hat. As you come back, step into the tailor's shop, and ask if your new jacket is 'most done, and what the news is. I rather think, Jenny, we shall find out something worth hearing in the course of the day. By the way, they do say that Grace Van Courtlandt, Eve Effingham's cousin, is under concern!"

"Well, she is the last person I should think would be troubled about anything, for everybody says she is so desperate rich she might eat off silver if she liked, and she is sure of being married some time or other."

"That ought to heighten her concern. Oh! it does my heart good, when I see any of those flaunty people right well exercised! Nothing would make me happier than to see Eve Effingham herself groaning fairly in the spirit! That would teach her to take away the people's Points."

"But, Mrs. Abbot, then she would become almost as good a woman as you are yourself!"

"Not she, indeed! Though I am a miserable, graceless, awfully wicked sinner! Twenty times a day do I doubt whether I am actually converted or not; sin has got such a hold on my very heart-strings that I sometimes think they will crack before it lets go. Rinaldo Rinaldini Timothy, my child, do you toddle across the way, and give my compliments to Mrs. Hulbert, and inquire if it be true whether young Dickson the lawyer is really engaged to Aspasia Tubbs or not; and borrow a skimmer or a tin-pot, or anything you can carry, for we may want something of the sort in the course of the day. I do believe, Jenny, that a worse creature than myself is hardly to be found in Templeton!"

"Why, Mrs. Abbot," returned Jenny, who had heard too much of this self-abasement to be much alarmed about it, "this is giving almost as bad an account of yourself as I heard somebody that I won't name give of you last week."

"And who is your somebody, I should like to know? I dare say, one no better than a formalist, who thinks that reading prayers out of a book, kneeling, bowing, and changing gowns, is religion! Thank Heaven! I'm pretty indifferent to the opinions of such people. Hark'e, Jenny, if I thought I was no better than some persons I could name, I'd give up the point of salvation in despair."

"Mrs. Abbot!" roared a ragged, dirty-faced, bare-footed boy, who bolted in without knocking, and stood in the middle of the room with his hat on, with a suddenness that denoted great readiness in entering other people's possessions ; " Mrs. Abbot, ma' wants to know if you are likely to go from home this week ? "

" Why, what in nature can she want to know that for, Ordeal Bumgrum ? " Mrs. Abbot pronounced this singular name " Or-deel. "

" Oh ! she wants to know. "

" So do I want to know, and know I will ; run home this instant, and ask your mother why she has sent you here with this message. Jenny, I am much exercised to find out the reason Mrs. Bumgrum should have sent Ordeal over with such a question. "

" I did hear that Mrs. Bumgrum intended to make a journey herself, and she may want your company. "

" Here comes Ordeal back, and we shall soon be out of the clouds. What a boy that is for errands ! He is worth all my sons put together. You never see him losing time by going round by the streets, but away he goes over the garden fences like a cat, or he will whip through a house, if it stand in his way, like its owner, if the door happen to be open only an inch. Well, Ordeal ? "

But Ordeal was out of breath, and although Jenny shook him as if to shake the news out of him, and Mrs. Abbot actually shook her fist in her impatience to be enlightened, nothing could induce the child to speak until he recovered his wind.

" I believe he does it on purpose, " said the provoked maid.

" It 's just like him, " cried the mistress ; " the very best news-carrier in the village is actually spoilt, because he is thick-winded. "

" I wish the folks wouldn't make their fences so high, " Ordeal exclaimed, the instant he found breath ; " I can't see of what use it is to make a fence people can't climb ! "

" What does your mother say ? " cried Jenny, repeating her shake con amore.

" Ma' wants to know, Mrs. Abbot, if you don't intend to use it yourself, if you will lend her your name for a few days, to go to Utica with ? She says folks don't treat her half as well when she is called Bumgrum as when she has another name, and she thinks she 'd like to try yours this time. "

" Is that all ! — you needn't have been so hurried about such a trifle, Ordeal. Give my compliments to your mother, and tell her she is quite welcome to my name, and I hope it will be serviceable to her. "

" She says she is willing to pay for the use of it, if you will tell her what the damage will be. "

" Oh ! it's not worth while to speak of such a trifle ; I dare say she will bring it back quite as good as when she took it away. "

I am no such unneighbourly or aristocratical person, as to wish to keep my name all to myself. Tell your mother she is welcome to it, and to keep it as long as she likes, and not to say anything about pay; I may want to borrow hers, or something else, one of these days, though, to say the truth, my neighbours are apt to complain of me as unfriendly and proud, for not borrowing as much as a good neighbour ought."

Ordeal departed, leaving Mrs. Abbot in some such condition as that of the man who had no shadow. A rap at the door interrupted the further discussion of the old subject, and Mr. Steadfast Dodge appeared in answer to the permission to enter. Mr. Dodge and Mrs. Abbot were congenial spirits in the way of news, he living by it, and she living on it.

"You are very welcome, Mr. Dodge," the mistress of the house commenced; "I hear you passed the day yesterday up at the Effinghams'."

"Why, yes, Mrs. Abbot, the Effinghams insisted on it, and I could not well get over the sacrifice, after having been their ship-mate so long; besides, it is a little relief to talk French when one has been months in the daily practice of it."

"I hear there is company at the house?"

"Two of our fellow-travellers merely—an English baronet, and a young man of whom less is known than one could wish. He is a mysterious person, and I hate mystery, Mrs. Abbot."

"In that, then, Mr. Dodge, you and I are alike. I think everything should be known. Indeed, that is not a free country in which there are any secrets. I keep nothing from my neighbours, and, to own the truth, I do not like my neighbours to keep anything from me."

"Then you'll hardly like the Effinghams, for I never yet met with a more close-mouthed family. Although I was so long in the ship with Miss Eve, I never heard her once speak of her want of appetite, of sea-sickness, or of anything relating to her ailments; nor can you imagine how close she is on the subject of the beaux. I do not think I ever heard her use the word, or so much as allude to any walk or ride she ever took with a man in her life. I set her down, Mrs. Abbot, as dreadfully artful."

"That you may with certainty, sir; for there is no more sure sign that a young woman is all the while thinking of the beaux, than her never mentioning them."

"That I believe to be human nature; no ingenuous person ever thinks much of the particular subject of conversation. What is your opinion, Mrs. Abbot, of the contemplated match at the Wigwam?"

"Match!" exclaimed Mrs. Abbot, much as a dog would snap at a bone. "What, already! It is the most indecent thing I ever heard of! Why, Mr. Dodge, the family has not been home a fortnight, and to think so soon of getting married! It is quite as bad as widowers marrying within the month."

Mrs. Abbot made a distinction habitually between the cases of widowers and widows, as the first, she maintained, might get married whenever they pleased, and the latter only when they got offers; and she felt just that sort of horror at a man's thinking of marrying too soon, after the death of his wife, as might be expected in one who actually contemplated a second husband before the first was dead.

"Why, yes," returned Steadfast, "it is a little premature, perhaps, though they have been long acquainted. Still, as you say, it would be more decent to wait and see what may turn up in a country that to them may be said to be a foreign land."

"But who are the parties, Mr. Dodge?"

"Miss Eve Effingham, and Mr. John Effingham."

"Mr. John Effingham!" exclaimed the lady aghast, for this was knocking one of her own day-dreams on the head; "well, this is too much! But he shall not marry her, sir; the law will prevent it, and we live in a country of laws. A man cannot marry his own niece."

"It is excessively improper, and ought to be put a stop to. And yet these Effinghams do very much as they please."

"I am very sorry to hear that they are extremely disagreeable," said Mrs. Abbot, with a look of eager inquiry, as if afraid the answer might be in the negative.

"As much so as possible; they have hardly a way that you would like, my dear marm; and as close-mouthed as if they were always afraid of committing themselves."

"Desperate bad news-carriers, I am told, Mr. Dodge. There is Dorindy (Dorinda) Mudge, who was employed there by Eve and Grace one day; she tells me she tried all sorts of ways to get them to talk, by speaking of the most common things—things that one of my children knew all about—such as the affairs of the neighbourhood, and how people are getting on; and though they would listen a little,—and that is something, I admit,—not a syllable could she get in the way of answer or remark. She tells me that several times she had a mind to quit, for it is monstrous unpleasant to associate with your tongue-tied folks."

"I dare say Miss Effingham could throw out a hint, now and then, concerning the voyage and her late fellow-travellers," said Steadfast, casting an uneasy glance at his companion.

"Not she. Dorindy maintains that it is impossible to get a sentiment out of her concerning a single fellow-creature. When she talked of the late unpleasant affair of poor neighbour Bronson's family,—a melancholy transaction that, Mr. Dodge, and I shouldn't wonder if it went nigh to break Mrs. Bronson's heart; but when Dorindy mentioned this, which is bad enough to stir the sensibility of a frog, neither of my young ladies replied, or put a single question. In this respect Grace is as bad as Eve, and Eve is as bad as Grace, they say. Instead of so much as seeming to wish to know any more, what does my Miss Eve do, but turn to some daubs of painting, and point out to her cousin what she was pleased to term peculiarities in Swiss scenery. Then the two hussies would talk of nature : our beautiful nature, Dorindy says, Eve had the impudence to call it; as if human nature, and its failings and backslidings, were not a fitter subject for a young woman's discourse than a silly conversation about lakes and rocks and trees, and as if she owned the nature about Templeton. It is my opinion, Mr. Dodge, that downright ignorance is at the bottom of it all, for Dorindy says that they actually know no more of the vicinities of the neighbourhood than if they lived in Japan."

"All pride, Mrs. Abbot, rank pride. They feel themselves too great to enter into the minutiae of common folk's concerns. I often tried Miss Effingham, coming from England; and she always disdainfully refused to enter into things touching private interest, that I know she did and must understand. Oh! she is a real Tartar in her way; and what she does not wish to do, you never can make her do!"

"Have you heard that Grace is under concern?"

"Not a breath of it! Under whose preaching, Mrs. Abbot?"

"That is more than I can tell you; not under the church parson's I'll engage: no one ever heard of a real, active regenerating, and fruit-yielding conversion under his ministry."

"No, there is very little unction in that persuasion generally. How cold and apathetic they are in these soul-stirring times! Not a sinner has been writhing on their floor, I'll engage, nor a wretch transferred into a saint in the twinkling of an eye, by their power. Well, we have every reason to be grateful, Mrs. Abbot."

"That we have, for most glorious have been our privileges. To be sure that is a sinful pride that can puff up a wretched sinful being like Eve Effingham to such a pass of conceit, as to induce her to think she is raised above thinking of, and taking an interest in, the affairs of her neighbours. Now, for my part, conversion has so far opened my heart, that I do actually feel as if I wanted to know all about the meanest creature in Templeton."

"That's the true spirit, Mrs. Abbot. Stick to that, and your redemption is secure. I only edit a newspaper by way of showing an interest in mankind."

"I hope, Mr. Dodge, the press does not mean to let this matter of the Point sleep; the press is the true guardian of the public rights, and I can tell you the whole community looks to that for support in this crisis."

"We shall not fail to do our duty," said Mr. Dodge, looking over his shoulder, and speaking lower. "What! shall one insignificant individual, who has not a single right above that of the meanest citizen in the country, oppress this great and powerful community! What if Mr. Effingham does own this point of land?"

"But he does not own it," interrupted Mrs. Abbot. "Ever since I have known Templeton the public have owned it. The public, moreover, say they own it, and what the public say, in this happy country, is law."

"But, allowing that the public do not own—"

"They do own it, Mr. Dodge," the lady repeated more positively.

"Well, marm, own or no own, this is not a country in which the press ought to be silent when a solitary insignificant individual undertakes to trample on the public. Leave that matter to us, Mrs. Abbot; it is in good hands, and shall be well taken care of."

"I'm piously glad of it!"

"I mention this to you as to a friend," continued Mr. Dodge, cautiously drawing from his pocket a manuscript which he prepared to read to his companion, who sat with a devouring curiosity ready to listen.

The manuscript of Mr. Dodge contained a professed account of the affair of the Point. It was written obscurely, and not without its contradictions; but the imagination of Mrs. Abbot supplied all vacuums, and reconciled all the inconsistencies. The article was so liberal of its professions of contempt for Mr. Effingham, that every rational man was compelled to wonder why a quality, that is usually so passive, should in this particular instance be aroused to so sudden and violent an activity. In the way of facts, not one was faithfully stated, and there were several deliberate, unmitigated falsehoods, which went essentially to colour the whole account.

"I think this will answer the purpose," said Steadfast, "and we have taken means to see that it shall be well circulated."

"This will do them good," cried Mrs. Abbot, almost breathless with delight. "I hope folks will believe it!"

"No fear of that. If it were a party thing now, one half would believe it, as a matter of course, and the other half would not believe it, as a matter of course; but, in a private matter, Lord bless you, marm, people are always ready to believe anything that will give them something to talk about."

Here the tête-à-tête was interrupted by the return of Mrs. Abbot's different messengers, all of whom, like the dove sent forth from the ark, brought back something in the way of gossip. The Point was a common theme, and though the several accounts flatly contradicted each other, Mrs. Abbot, in the general benevolence of her pious heart, found means to extract a corroboration of her wishes from each.

Mr. Dodge was as good as his word, and the account appeared. The press throughout the country seized with avidity on anything that helped to fill its columns. No one appeared disposed to inquire into the truth of the account, or after the character of the original authority. It was in print, and that struck the great majority of the editors and their readers as sufficient sanction. Few indeed were they who lived so much under a proper self-control as to hesitate; and this rank injustice was done a private citizen, as much without moral restraint as without remorse, by those who, to take their own account of the matter, were the regular and habitual champions of human rights!

John Effingham pointed out this extraordinary scene of reckless wrong to his wondering cousin with the cool sarcasm with which he was apt to assail the weaknesses and crimes of the country. His firmness, united to that of his cousin, however, put a stop to the publication of the resolutions of Aristobulus's meeting, and after a time he procured them, and had them published himself, as the most effectual means of exposing the real character of the senseless mob that had thus disgraced liberty, by assuming its professions and its usages, while it so unequivocally betrayed that it knew nothing of its spirit.

To an observer of men, the end of this affair presented several strong points for comment. As soon as the truth became generally known, in reference to the real ownership of the spot in dispute, and the public came to ascertain that, instead of hitherto possessing a right, they had, in fact, been merely enjoying a favour, those who had committed themselves by their arrogant assumptions of facts and their indecent outrages, fell back on their self-love, and began to seek excuses for their own conduct in that of the other party. Mr. Effingham was loudly condemned for not having done the very thing he, in truth, had done, viz.—telling the public they did not own his property; and when this was shown to be an absurdity, the compliant followed of the mode which he had adopted in doing what he had done, although it was precisely the one constantly used by everybody else. From these vague and indefinite accusations, those most implicated in the wrong began to deny all their own original assertions, by insisting they had known all along that Mr. Effingham owned the property, but that they did not choose that he, or any other man, should presume to tell them what they so well knew already. In short, the end of this affair exhibited human nature in its usual aspects of prevarication, untruth, contradiction, and inconsistency; and notwithstanding the high profession of liberty made by those implicated, they who had been the most guilty of wrong were loudest in their complaints, as if they alone had suffered.

“This is not exhibiting the country to us, certainly, after so long an absence, in its best appearance,” said Mr. Effingham, “I must admit, John; but error belongs to all regions, and to all classes of institutions.”

“Ay, Ned, make the best of it, as usual; but, if you do not come round to my way of thinking before you are a twelvemonth older, I shall renounce prophecy. I wish we could get at the bottom of Miss Effingham’s thoughts on this occasion.”

“Miss Effingham has been grieved, disappointed, nay shocked,” said Eve; “but still she does not despair of the republic. None of our respectable neighbours, in the first place, have shared in this transaction, and that is something; though I confess I feel some surprise that any considerable portion of a community that respects itself, should quietly allow an ignorant fragment of its own numbers to misrepresent it so grossly, in an affair that so closely touches its own character for common sense and justice.”

“You have yet to learn, Miss Effingham, that men can get to be so saturated with liberty, that they become insensible to the nicer feelings. The grossest enormities are actually committed in this good republic of ours under the pretence of their being done by the public, and for the public. The people bow to that bugbear quite as submissively as Gessler could have wished the Swiss to bow to his own cap, as that of Rodolph’s substitute. Men will have idols, and the Americans have merely set up themselves.”

“And yet, cousin Jack, you would be wretched were you doomed to live under a system less free. I fear you have the affectation of sometimes saying that which you do not exactly feel.”

CHAPTER XVII.

Come, these are no times to think of dreams—
We 'll talk of dreams hereafter.

SHAKSPEARE.

The day succeeding that in which the conversation just mentioned occurred, was one of great expectation and delight in the Wigwam. Mrs. Hawker and the Bloomfields were expected, and the morning passed away rapidly, under the buoyancy of the feelings that usually accompany such hopes in an American country house. The travellers were to leave town the previous evening, and though the distance was nearly two hundred and thirty miles, they were engaged to arrive by the usual dinner hour. In speed the Americans, so long as they follow the great routes, are unsurpassed, and even Sir George Templemore, coming as he did from a country of macadamized roads and excellent posting, expressed his surprise, when given to understand that a journey of this length, nearly a hundred miles of which were by land, was to be performed in twenty-four hours, the stops included.

“One particularly likes such rapid travelling,” he remarked, “when it is to bring us such friends as Mrs. Hawker.”

“And Mrs. Bloomfield,” added Eve, quickly. “I rest the credit of the American females on Mrs. Bloomfield.”

“More so than on the first, Miss Effingham?”

“Not in all that is amiable, respectable, feminine, and lady-like; but certainly more so in the way of mind. I know, Sir George Templemore, as a European, what your opinion is of our sex in this country—”

“Good Heaven, my dear Miss Effingham!—My opinion of your sex in America! It is impossible for any one to entertain a higher opinion of your countrywomen—as I hope to show—as I trust my respect and admiration have always proved—nay, Powis, you, as an American, will exonerate me from this want of taste—judgment—feeling—”

Paul laughed, but told the embarrassed and really distressed baronet, that he should leave him in the very excellent hands into which he had fallen.

“You see yonder bird, that is sailing so gaily above the roofs of the village,” said Eve, pointing with her parasol in the direction she meant, for the three were walking together on the little lawn, in waiting for the appearance of the expected guests; "I dare say you are ornithologist enough to tell its vulgar name."

"You are in the humour to be severe this morning—the bird is a common swallow."

"One of which will not make a summer, as every one knows. Our cosmopolitism is already forgotten, and with it, I fear, our frankness."

"Since Powis has hoisted his national colours, I do not feel so free on such subjects as formerly," returned Sir George, smiling. "When I thought I had a secret ally in him, I was not afraid to concede a little in such things, but his avowal of his country has put me on my guard. In no case, however, shall I admit my insensibility to the qualities of your countrywomen. Powis, as a native, may take that liberty; for myself, I shall maintain that they are at least the equals of any females I know."

"In naïveté, prettiness, delicacy of appearance, simplicity, and sincerity—"

"In sincerity, think you, dear Miss Effingham?"

"In sincerity, above all things, dear Sir George Templemore. Sincerity—nay, frankness,—is the last quality I should think of denying them."

"But to return to Mrs. Bloomfield—she is clever, exceedingly clever, I allow; yet in what is her cleverness to be distinguished from that of one of her sex on the other side of the ocean?"

"Perhaps there is no difference more prominent than that which shows itself in national characteristics. Naples and New York are in the same latitude, and yet I think you will agree with me that there is little resemblance between the habits and tastes of their respective populations."

"I confess I do not understand the allusion;—are you quicker-witted, Powis?"

"I will not say that," said Paul; "but I think I do comprehend Miss Effingham's meaning. You have travelled enough to know that, as a rule, there is more aptitude in a southern than in a northern people. They receive impressions more readily, and are quicker in all their perceptions."

"I believe this to be true; but then you will allow that they are less constant, and have less perseverance?"

"In that we are agreed, Sir George Templemore," resumed Eve, "though we might differ as to the causes. The inconstancy of which you speak is more connected with moral than physical causes, perhaps, and we of this region might claim an exemption from some of them. But Mrs. Bloomfield is distinguished from her European rivals by a frame so singularly feminine as to appear fragile, a delicacy of exterior which, were it not for that illumined face of hers, might indicate a general feebleness, a sensitiveness and quickness of intellect which amount almost to inspiration, and yet all is balanced by a practical common sense, that renders her as safe a conseller as she is a warm friend. This latter quality causes you sometimes to doubt her genius, it is so very homely and available. Now, it is in this that I think the American woman, when she does rise above mediocrity, is particularly to be distinguished from the European. The latter, as a genius, is almost always in the clouds, whereas Mrs. Bloomfield, in her highest flights, is either all heart or all good sense. The nation is practical, and the practical qualities are imparted even to its highest order of talents."

"The English women are thought to be less excitable, and not so much under the influence of sentimentalism as some of their continental neighbours."

"And very justly—but—"

"But what, Miss Effingham?—There is, in all this, a slight return to the cosmopolitism, that reminds me of our days of peril and adventure. Do not conceal a thought, if you wish to preserve that character."

"Well, to be sincere, I shall say that your women live under a system too sophisticated and factitious to give fair play to common sense at all times. What, for instance, can be the habitual notions of one, who, professing the doctrines of Christianity, is accustomed to find money placed so very much in the ascendant, as to see it daily exacted in payment for the very first of the sacred offices of the church? It would be as rational to contend that a mirror which had been cracked into radii by a bullet, like those we have so often seen in Paris, would reflect faithfully, as to suppose a mind familiarized to such abuses would be sensitive on practical and common sense things."

"But, my dear Miss Effingham, this is all habit."

"I know it is all habit, Sir George Templemore, and a very bad habit it is. Even your most devout clergymen become so accustomed to it, as not to see the capital mistake they make. I do not say it is absolutely sinful, where there is no compulsion; but I hope you agree with me, Mr. Powis, when I say I think a clergyman ought to be so sensitive on such a subject as to refuse even the little offerings for baptisms that it is the practice of the wealthy of this country to make."

"I agree with you entirely, for it would denote a more vivid perception of the nature of the office they are performing, and they who wish to give can always make occasions."

"A hint might be taken from Franklin, who is said to have desired his father to ask a blessing on the pork barrel, by way of condensation," said John Effingham, who joined them as he spoke, and had also heard a part of the conversation. "In this instance, an average might be struck in the marriage fee that should embrace all future baptisms. But here comes neighbour Howel to favour us with his opinion. Do you like the usages of the English church, as respects baptisms, Howel?"

"Mr. Howel is so true an Englishman," said Eve, shaking hands cordially with their well-meaning neighbour, "that he would give a certificate in favour of any usage which can boast such an origin."

"And is not this a more natural sentiment for an American than that which distrusts so much, merely because it comes from the little island?" asked Sir George reproachfully.

"Why, Sir George," observed the gentleman alluded to, "I do not attribute my respect for your country, in the least, to origin. I endeavour to keep myself free from all sorts of prejudice. My admiration of England arises from conviction, and I watch all her movements with the utmost jealousy, in order to see if I cannot find her tripping, though I feel bound to say I have never yet detected her in a single error. What a very different picture is afforded by France,—I hope your governess is not within hearing, Miss Eve; it is not her fault she was born a French woman, and one would not wish to hurt her feelings—but what a different picture France presents! I have watched her narrowly, too, these forty years, I may say, and I have never yet found her right, and this you must allow is a great deal to be said by one who is thoroughly impartial."

"This is a terrible picture indeed, Howel, to come from an unprejudiced man," said John Effingham, "and I make no doubt Sir George Templemore will have a better opinion of himself for ever after; he for a valiant lion, and you for a true prince. But yonder is the 'exclusive extra,' which contains our party."

The elevated bit of lawn on which they were walking commanded a view of the road that led into the village, and the travelling vehicle engaged by Mrs. Hawker and her friends was now seen moving along it at a rapid pace. Eve expressed her satisfaction, and then all resumed their walk, as some minutes must still elapse previously to the arrival.

"Exclusive extra!" repeated Sir George; "that is a peculiar phrase, and one that denotes anything but democracy."

"In any other part of the world a thing would be sufficiently marked by being extra, but here it requires the addition of 'exclusive,' in order to give it the 'tower stamp,'" said John Effingham, with a curl of his handsome lip. "Anything may be as exclusive as it pleases, provided it bear the public impress. A stage-coach being intended for everybody, why, the more exclusive it is the better. The next thing we shall hear of will be exclusive steam-boats, exclusive rail-roads, and both for the uses of the exclusive people."

Sir George now seriously asked an explanation of the meaning of the term, when Mr. Howel informed him that an 'extra,' in America, meant a supernumerary coach, to carry any excess of the ordinary number of passengers, whereas an 'exclusive extra' meant a coach expressly engaged by a particular individual.

"The latter, then, is American posting," observed Sir George.

"You have got the best idea of it that can be given," said Paul. "It is virtually posting with a coachman instead of postillions, as few persons in this country, where so much is accomplished by means of steam, think of using their own travelling carriages. The American 'exclusive extra' is not only posting, but, in many of the older parts of the country, it is posting of a very good quality."

"I dare say, now, that this is all wrong, if we only knew it," said the simple-minded Mr. Howel. "There is nothing exclusive in England,—ha! Sir George?"

Everybody laughed except the person who put this question; but the rattling of wheels and the tramping of horses on the village bridge announced the near approach of the travellers. By the time the party had reached the great door in front of the house, the carriage was already in the grounds, and at the next moment Eve was in the arms of Mrs. Bloomfield. It was apparent, at a glance, that the vehicle contained more than the expected number of guests, and as its contents were slowly discharged, the spectators stood around it with curiosity to observe who would appear.

The first person who descended, after the exit of Mrs. Bloomfield, was Captain Truck, who, however, instead of saluting his friends, turned assiduously to the door he had just passed through to assist Mrs. Hawker to alight. Not until after this office had been performed did he even look for Eve, for so profound were the worthy captain's admiration and respect for this venerable lady, that she actually had supplanted our heroine in some measure in his heart. Mr. Bloomfield appeared next, and an exclamation of surprise and pleasure proceeded from both Paul and the baronet, as they caught a glimpse of the face of the last of the travellers that got out.

"Ducie!" cried Sir George; "this is even better than we expected."

"Ducie!" added Paul, "you are several days before the expected time, and in excellent company."

The explanation, however, was very simple. Captain Ducie had found the facilities for rapid motion much greater than he had expected, and he had reached Fort Plain, in the eastward cars, as the remainder of the party arrived in the westward. Captain Truck, who had met Mrs. Hawker's party in the river boats, had been intrusted with the duty of making the arrangements; and recognizing Captain Ducie, to their mutual surprise, while engaged in this employment, and ascertaining his destination, the latter was very cordially received into the "exclusive extra."

Mr. Effingham welcomed all his guests with the hospitality and kindness for which he was distinguished. We are no great admirers of the pretension to peculiar national virtues, having ascertained to our own satisfaction, by tolerably extensive observation, that the moral difference between men is of no great amount; but we are almost tempted to say, on this occasion, that Mr. Effingham received his guests with American hospitality; for if there be one quality that this people can claim to possess in a higher degree than most other Christian nations, it is that of a simple, sincere, confiding hospitality. For Mrs. Hawker, in common with all who knew her, the owner of the Wigwam entertained a profound respect, and though his less active mind did not take so much pleasure as that of his daughter, in the almost intuitive intelligence of Mrs. Bloomfield, he also felt for this lady a very friendly regard. It gratified him exceedingly to see Eve surrounded by persons of her own sex of so high a tone of thought and breeding, which was at the same time completely removed from anything of a strained or artificial character, and his welcomes were cordial in proportion. Mr. Bloomfield was a quiet, sensible, gentlemanlike man, whom his wife fervently loved, without making any parade of her attachment, and he was also one who had the good sense to make himself agreeable wherever he went. Captain Ducie, who, Englishman like, had required some urging to be induced to present himself at the Wigwam before the precise hour named in his own letter, and who had seriously contemplated passing several days in a tavern previously to showing himself there, was agreeably disappointed at a reception that would have been just as frank and warm had he come without any notice at all. The Effinghams knew that the usages which sophistication and a crowded population perhaps render necessary in older countries, were not needed in their own; and then the circumstance that their quondam pursuer was so near a kinsman to Paul Powis did not fail to act essentially in his favour.

"We can offer but little, in these retired mountains, to interest a traveller and a man of the world, Captain Ducie," said Mr. Effingham, when he went to pay his compliments more particularly, after the whole party was in the house; "but there is a common interest in our past adventures to talk about when all other topics fail. When we met on the ocean, and you deprived us so unexpectedly of our friend Powis, we did not know that you had the better claim of affinity to his company."

Captain Ducie coloured slightly, but he made his answer with a proper degree of courtesy and gratitude.

"It is very true," he added, "Powis and myself are relatives, and I shall place all my claims to your hospitality on that circumstance, for I feel that I have been the unwilling cause of too much suffering to your party to bring with me any very pleasant recollections, notwithstanding your kindness in including me as a friend in the adventures of which you speak."

"Dangers that are happily past seldom bring very unpleasant recollections, more especially when they are connected with scenes of excitement. I understand, sir, that the unhappy young man who was the principal cause of all that passed, anticipated the sentence of the law by destroying himself."

"He was his own executioner, and the victim of a silly weakness that, I should think, your state of society was yet too young and simple to encourage. The idle vanity of making an appearance—a vanity, by the way, that seldom besets gentlemen, or the class to which it may be thought more properly to belong—ruins hundreds of young men in England, and this poor creature was of the number. I never rejoiced more sincerely than when he quitted my ship, for the sight of so much weakness sickened one of human nature. Miserable as was his fate, and pitiable as his condition really was, while in my charge, his case has the alleviating circumstance of having made me acquainted with those whom it might not otherwise have been my good fortune to meet."

This civil speech was properly acknowledged, and Mr. Effingham addressed himself to Captain Truck, to whom, in the hurry of the moment, he had not yet said half what his feelings dictated.

"I am rejoiced to see you under my roof, my worthy friend," said Mr. Effingham, taking the rough hand of the old seaman between his own whiter and more delicate fingers, and shaking it with cordiality, "for this is being under my roof, while those town residences have less the air of domestication and familiarity. You will spend many of your holidays here, I trust, and when we get to be a few years older we will begin to prattle about the marvels we have seen in company."

The eye of Captain Truck glistened, and as he returned the shake by another of twice the energy, and the gentle pressure of Mr. Effingham by a squeeze like that of a vice, he said, in his honest, off-hand manner, "The happiest hour I ever knew was that in which I discharged the pilot, the first time out, as a ship-master; the next great event of my life, in the way of happiness, was the moment I found myself on the deck of the Montauk, after we had given those greasy Arabs a hint that their absence was better than their company; and I really think this very instant must be set down as the third. I never knew, my dear sir, how much I really loved your daughter until she was out of sight."

"That is so kind and gallant a speech that it ought not to be lost on the person most concerned. Eve, my love, our worthy friend has just made a declaration which will be a novelty to you, who have not been much in the way of listening to speeches of this nature."

Mr. Effingham then acquainted his daughter with what Captain Truck had just said.

"This is certainly the first declaration of the sort I ever heard, and with the simplicity of an unpractised young woman, I here avow that the attachment is reciprocal," said the smiling Eve. "If there is an indiscretion in this hasty acknowledgment, it must be ascribed to surprise, and to the suddenness with which I have learned my power, for your parvenues are not always perfectly regulated."

"I hope Ma'm'selle V. A. V. is well," returned the captain, cordially shaking the hand the young lady had given him, "and that she enjoys herself to her liking in this outlandish country?"

"Mademoiselle Vieffville will return you her thanks in person at dinner; and, I believe, she does not yet regret la belle France unreasonably: as I regret it myself in many particulars, it would be unjust not to permit a native of the country some liberty in that respect."

"I perceive a strange face in the room—one of the family, my dear young lady?"

"Not a relative, but a very old friend.—Shall I have the pleasure of introducing you, captain?"

"I hardly dared to ask it, for I know you have some notions of your own about these matters, but I confess I should like an introduction. I have neither introduced nor been introduced, since I left New York, with the exception of the case of Captain Ducie, whom I made properly acquainted with Mrs. Hawker and her party, as you may suppose. They knew each other regularly, and you are saved the trouble of making them acquainted."

"And how is it with yourself and the Bloomfields? Did Mrs. Hawker name you to them properly?"

"That is the most extraordinary thing of the sort I ever knew.

Not a word was said in the way of introduction, and yet I slid into an acquaintance with Mrs. Bloomfield so easily, that I could not tell how it was done if my life depended on it. But this very old friend of yours, my dear young lady—”

“Captain Truck, Mr. Howel; Mr. Howel, Captain Truck,” said Eve, imitating the most approved manner of the introductory spirit of the day with admirable self-possession and gravity. “I am fortunate in having it in my power to make two persons whom I so much esteem acquainted.”

“Captain Truck is the gentleman who commands the Montauk,” said Mr. Howel, glancing at Eve, as much as to say, “am I right?”

“The very same, and the brave seaman to whom we are all indebted for the happiness of standing here at this moment.”

“You are to be envied, Captain Truck; of all the men in your calling you are exactly the one I should most wish to supplant. I understand you actually go to England twice every year!”

“Three times, sir, when the winds permit. I have even seen the old island four times between January and January.”

“What a pleasure! it must be the very perfection of navigation to sail between America and England!”

“It is not unpleasant, sir, from April to November, but the long nights, thick weather, and heavy winds, knock off a good deal of the satisfaction for the rest of the year.”

“But I speak of the country—of England itself—not of the passages.”

“Well, England has what I call a pretty fair coast. It is high, and great attention is paid to the lights; but of what account is either coast or lights if the weather is so thick that you cannot see the end of your flying jib-boom?”

“Mr. Howel alludes more particularly to the country inland,” said Eve; “to the towns, the civilization, and to the other proofs of cultivation and refinement: to the government especially.”

“In my judgment, sir, the government is much too particular about tobacco, and some other trifling things I could name. Then it restricts pennants to king’s ships, whereas, to my notion, my dear young lady, a New York packet is as worthy of wearing a pennant as any vessel that floats. I mean, of course, ships of the regular European lines, and not the southern traders.”

“But these are merely spots on the sun, my good sir,” returned Mr. Howel; “putting a few such trifles out of the question, I think you will allow that England is the most delightful country under the sun?"

"To be frank with you, Mr. Howel, there is a good deal of hang-dog weather in October, November, and December. I have known March anything but agreeable, and then April is just like a young girl with one of your melancholy novels, now smiling, and now blubbering."

"But the morals of the country, my dear sir; the moral features of England must be a source of never-dying delight to a true philanthropist," resumed Mr. Howel, as Eve, who perceived that the discussion was likely to be long, went to join the ladies again.

"An Englishman has most reason to be proud of the moral excellences of his country!"

"Why, to be frank with you, Mr. Howel, there are some of the moral features of London that are anything but very beautiful. If you could pass twenty-four hours in the neighbourhood of St. Catharine's, you would see sights that would throw Templeton into fits. The English are a handsome people, I allow, but their morality is none of the best featured."

"Let us be seated, sir; I am afraid we are not exactly agreed on our terms, and, in order that we may continue this subject, I beg you will let me take a seat next you at table."

To this Captain Truck very cheerfully assented, and then the two took chairs, continuing the discourse very much in the blind and ambiguous manner in which it had been commenced; the one party insisted on seeing everything through the medium of an imagination that had become diseased on such subjects, or through a species of monomania; while the other seemed obstinately determined to form his opinion of the entire country from the aspect which things presented to his limited and peculiar experience near St. Catharine's Dock."

"We have had a very unexpected and a very agreeable attendant in Captain Truck," said Mrs. Hawker pleasantly, when Eve had placed herself by her side, and respectfully taken one of her hands. "I do really think, if I were to suffer shipwreck, or to run the hazards of captivity, I should choose to have both occur in his good company."

"Mrs. Hawker makes so many conquests," observed Mrs. Bloomfield, "that we are to think nothing of her success with this merman; but what will you say, Miss Effingham, when you learn that I am also in favour in the same high quarter? I shall think the better of masters and boatswains, Trinculos and Stephanos, as long as I live, for this specimen of their craft."

"Not Trinculos and Stephanos dear Mrs. Bloomfield, for, à l'exception près de Saturday nights, and sweethearts and wives, a more exemplary person does not exist than our excellent Captain Truck. He is much too religious and moral for so vulgar an excess as drinking."

"Religious!" exclaimed Mrs. Bloomfield in surprise; "this is a merit to which I did not know he possessed the smallest claim. One might imagine a little superstition and some short-lived repentances in gales of wind, in such a subject, but scarcely anything as much like a trade-wind as religion!"

"Then you do not know him, for a more sincerely devout man, though I acknowledge it is after a fashion that is, perhaps, peculiar to the ocean, is not often met with: at any rate, you found him attentive to our sex?"

"The pink of politeness, and, not to embellish, there is a manly deference about him that is singularly agreeable to our frail vanity. This comes of his packet-training, I suppose, and we may thank you for some portion of his merit: his tongue never tires in your praise, and did I not feel persuaded that your mind is made up never to be the wife of any republican American, I should fear this visit exceedingly. Notwithstanding the remark I made concerning my being in favour, the affair lies between Mrs. Hawker and yourself. I know it is not your habit to trifle even on that very popular subject with young ladies—matrimony; but this case forms so complete an exception to the vulgar passion, that I trust you will overlook the indiscretion. Our golden captain, for copper he is not, protests that Mrs. Hawker is the most delightful old lady he ever knew, and that Miss Eve Effingham is the most delightful young lady he ever knew. Here then each may see the ground she occupies, and play her cards accordingly. I hope to be forgiven for touching on a subject so delicate."

"In the first place," said Eve, "I should wish to hear Mrs. Hawker's reply."

"I have no more to say than to express my gratitude," answered that lady, pleasantly, "to announce a determination not to change my condition yet, on account of extreme youth, and a disposition to abandon the field to any older, if not fairer rival."

"Well, then," resumed Eve, laughing, but anxious to change the subject, for she saw Paul approaching their group, "I believe it will be wisest in me to suspend my decision, circumstances leaving so much at my disposal. Time must show what that decision will be."

"Nay," said Mrs. Bloomfield, who saw no reason for her trifling, "this is unjustifiable coquetry, and I feel bound to ascertain how the land lies. You will remember I am the captain's confidant, and you know the fearful responsibility of a friend in an affair of this sort ; that of a friend in the duello being insignificant in comparison. That I may have testimony at need, Mr. Powis must be acquainted with the leading facts. Captain Truck is a devout admirer of this young lady, sir, and I am endeavouring to discover whether he ought to hang himself on her father's lawn this evening, as soon as the moon rises, or live another miserable week. In order to do this, I shall pursue the categorical and inquisitorial method ; and so defend yourself, Miss Effingham. Do you object to the country of your admirer ? ”

Eve, though inwardly vexed at the turn this trifling had taken, maintained a perfectly composed manner, for she knew that Mrs. Bloomfield had too much feminine propriety to say anything improper intentionally, or anything that might seriously embarrass her.

“ It would indeed be extraordinary should I object to a country which is not only my own, but which has so long been that of my ancestors,” she answered steadily. “ On this score, my knight has nothing to fear. ”

“ I rejoice to hear this,” returned Mrs. Bloomfield, glancing her eye, unconsciously to herself however, towards Sir George Templemore ; “ and, Mr. Powis, you, who I believe are a European, will learn humility in the avowal. Do you object to your swain that he is a seaman ? ”

Eve blushed, notwithstanding a strong effort to appear composed, and for the first time since their acquaintance she felt provoked with Mrs. Bloomfield. She hesitated ; and this, too, in a way to give more meaning to her reply, although nothing could be further from her intentions before she answered in the negative.

“ The happy man may then be an American and a seaman ! Here is great encouragement. Do you object to sixty ? ”

“ In any other man I should certainly consider it a trifling blemish, as my own dear father is but fifty yet. ”

Mrs. Bloomfield was struck with the tremor in the voice, and with the air of embarrassment, in one who usually was so easy and collected, and with feminine sensitiveness she instantly abandoned the trifling, though she often recurred to this stifled emotion in the course of the day ; and from that moment she became a silent observer of Eve's deportment with all her father's guests.

“ This is hope enough for one day,” she said, rising ; “ the profession and the flag must counterbalance the years as best they may. Mrs. Hawker, we shall be late at dinner, I see by that clock, unless we speedily retire. ”

Both the ladies now went to their rooms ; Eve, who was already dressed for dinner, remaining in the drawing-room. Paul still stood before her, and, like herself, he seemed embarrassed.

"There are men who would be delighted to hear even the little that has fallen from your lips in this trifling," he said, as soon as Mrs. Bloomfield was out of hearing. "To be an American and a seaman, then, are not serious defects in your eyes."

"Am I to be made responsible for Mrs. Bloomfield's caprice and pleasantries?"

"By no means; but I do think you hold yourself responsible for Miss Effingham's truth and sincerity. I can understand your silence when questioned too far, but I feel assured that any direct declaration of yours must possess both of these high qualities."

Eve looked up gratefully, for she saw that his profound respect for her character dictated the remark, but rising, she said, struggling not to betray herself,

"This is making a little badinage about our honest, lion-hearted old captain, a very serious affair. And now, to show you that I am conscious of and grateful for your own compliment, I shall place you on the footing of an old friend to both the parties, and request you will take Captain Truck into your especial care while he remains here. My father and cousin are both sincerely his friends; but their habits are not so much those of their guest as yours will probably be; and to you, then, I commit him, with a request that he may miss his ship and the ocean as little as possible."

"I would I knew how to take this charge, Miss Effingham! To be a seaman is not always a recommendation with the polished, intelligent, and refined."

"But when one is polished, intelligent, and refined, to be a seaman is to add one other particular and useful branch of knowledge to those which are more familiar. I feel certain Captain Truck will be in good hands, and now I will go and do my devoirs to my own especial charge, the ladies."

Eve bowed as she passed the young man, and she left the room with as much haste as became her. Paul stood motionless for a brief period after she had vanished, nor did he awaken from his reverie until called by an appeal from Captain Truck to sustain the latter in some of his matter-of-fact opinions concerning England, against the visionary and bookish notions of Mr. Howel.

"Who is this Mr. Powis?" asked Mrs. Bloomfield of Eve, when the latter appeared in her dressing-room, with an impatience of manner and an abruptness unusual to her.

"You know, my dear Mrs. Bloomfield, that he was our fellow-passengers in the Montauk, and that he was of infinite service to us in escaping from the Arabs."

"All this I know, certainly; but he is a European, is he not?"

Eve scarcely ever felt more embarrassed than in answering this simple question.

"I believe not; at least, I think not; we thought so when we met him in Europe, and even until lately; but he has avowed himself a countryman of our own since his arrival at Templeton."

"Has he been here long?"

"We found him in the village, on reaching home. He came from Canada, and has been waiting for his cousin, Captain Ducie, who came with you."

"His cousin!—He has English cousins, then? Mr. Ducie kept this to himself, with true English reserve. Captain Truck whispered something of the latter's having taken out one of his passengers, the Mr. Powis, the hero of the rocks; and I did not know of his having found his way back to our—to his country. Is he as agreeable as Sir George Templemore?"

"Nay, Mrs. Bloomfield, I must leave you to judge of that for yourself. I think them both agreeable men; but there is so much caprice in a woman's taste, that I decline thinking for others."

"He is a seaman, I believe," observed Mrs. Bloomfield, with an abstracted manner—"he must be, to have manœuvred and managed as I have been told he did. Powis—Powis—that is not one of our names either;—he must be from the south, I should think."

Here Eve's habitual truth and dignity of mind did her good service, and prevented any further betrayal of her feelings.

"We do not know his family," she answered simply. "That he is a gentleman we see; but of his origin and connexions he never speaks."

"His profession would have given him the notions of a gentleman, for he was in the navy, I hear, although I had thought it the British navy. I do not know of any Powises in Philadelphia, or Baltimore, or Richmond, or Charleston; he must be from the interior."

Eve could scarcely condemn her friend for a curiosity that had not a little tormented herself, though she would gladly have changed the discourse.

"Mr. Powis would be gratified did he know what a subject of interest he is with Mrs. Bloomfield," she said, smiling.

"I confess he is; to be very sincere, I think him the most distinguished young man, in air, appearance, and expression of countenance, I ever saw. When this is coupled with what I have heard of his gallantry and coolness, my dear, I should not be woman to feel no interest in him. I would give the world to know of what state he is a native, if native in truth he be."

“For that we have his own words. He was born in this country, and was educated in our own marine.”

“And yet from the little that fell from him in our first short conversation, he struck me as being educated above his profession.”

“Mr. Powis has seen much as a traveller; when we met him in Europe, it was in a circle particularly qualified to improve both his mind and his manners.”

“Europe! Your acquaintance did not then commence, like that with Sir George Templemore, in the packet?”

“Our acquaintance with neither commenced in the packet. My father had often seen both these gentlemen during our residence in different parts of Europe.”

“And your father’s daughter?”

“My father’s daughter, too,” said Eve, laughing. “With Mr. Powis, in particular, we became acquainted under circumstances that left a vivid recollection of his manliness and professional skill. He was of almost as much service to us, on one of the Swiss lakes, as, subsequently, on the ocean.”

All this was news to Mrs. Bloomfield, and she looked as if she thought the intelligence interesting. At this moment the dinner-bell rang, and all the ladies descended to the drawing-room. The gentlemen were already assembled, and as Mr. Effingham led Mrs. Hawker to the table, Mrs. Bloomfield gaily took Eve by the arm, protesting that she felt herself privileged the first day to take a seat near the young mistress of the Wigwam.

“Mr. Powis and Sir George Templemore will not now quarrel about this honour,” she said, in a low voice, as they proceeded towards the table.

“Indeed you are in an error, Mrs. Bloomfield; Sir George Templemore is much better pleased at being at liberty to sit next my cousin Grace.”

“Can this be so?” returned the other, looking intently at her young friend.

“Indeed it is so, and I am very glad to be able to affirm it. How far Miss Van Courtlandt is pleased that it is so, time must show; but the baronet betrays every day, and all day, that he is happiest when permitted to be near my cousin.”

“He is then a man of less taste, and judgment, and intelligence, than I had thought him!”

“Nay, dearest Mrs. Bloomfield; this is not necessarily true, or, if true, need it be openly said?”

“Se non è vero, è ben trovato!”

CHAPTER XVIII.

Thine for a space are they—
Yet shalt thou yield thy treasures up at last;
Thy gates shall yet give way,
Thy bolts shall fall, inexorable past.

BRYANT.

Captain Ducie had retired for the night, and was sitting reading, when a low tap at his door roused him from a brown study. He gave the necessary permission, and the door was opened.

"I hope, Ducie, you have not forgotten the secretary left among your effects," said Paul, entering the room, "and concerning which I wrote you when you were still at Quebec?"

Captain Ducie pointed to the case which was standing among his other luggage on the floor of his room.

"Thank you for this care," said Paul, taking the secretary under his arm, and retiring towards the door; "it contains papers of much importance to myself, and some that I have reason to think are of importance to others."

"Stop, Powis; one word before you quit me. Is Templemore de trop?"

"Not at all; I have a sincere regard for Templemore, and should be sorry to see him leave us."

"And yet I think it singular that a man of his habits should be rustivating among these hills, when I know he is expected to look at the Canadas, with a view to report their actual condition at home."

"Is Sir George really intrusted with a commission of that sort?" inquired Paul with interest.

"Not with any positive commission, perhaps, for none was necessary. Templemore is a rich fellow, and has no need of appointments; but it is hoped and understood that he will look at the provinces, and report their condition to the government. I dare say he will not be impeached for his negligence, but it will occasion surprise."

"Good night, Ducie; Templemore prefers a Wigwam to your walled Quebec, and natives to colonists; voilà tout!"

In a minute Paul was at the door of John Effingham's room, where he again tapped, and was again told to enter.

"Ducie has not forgotten my request, and this is the secretary that contains poor Mr. Monday's papers," he remarked, as he laid the case on a toilet-table, speaking in a way to show that he was expected. "We have, indeed, neglected this duty too long, and it is to be hoped no injustice or wrong to any one will be the consequence."

"Is that the package?" demanded John Effingham, extending a hand to receive a bundle of papers that Paul had taken from the secretary; "we will break the seals this moment, and ascertain what ought to be done before we sleep."

"These are papers of my own, and very precious they are," returned the young man, regarding them for a moment with interest before he laid them on the toilet. "Here are the papers of Mr. Monday."

John Effingham received the package from his young friend, placed the lights conveniently on the table, put on his spectacles, and invited Paul to be seated. The gentlemen were placed opposite to each other; the duty of breaking the seals, and of first casting an eye at the contents of the different documents, devolving, as a matter of course, on the senior of the two, who in truth had alone been intrusted with them.

"Here is something signed by poor Monday himself, in the way of a general certificate," observed John Effingham, who read the paper himself, and then handed it to Paul. It was addressed,—"To all whom it may concern." The certificate was in the following words.

"I, John Monday, do declare and certify, that all the accompanying letters and documents are genuine and authentic. Jane Dowse, to whom and from whom are so many letters, was my late mother, she having intermarried with Peter Dowse, the man so often named, and who led her into acts that I know she has since been deeply sorry for. In committing these papers to me, my poor mother left me the sole judge of the course I was to take, and I have put them in this form, in order that they may yet do good should I be called suddenly away. All depends on discovering who the person called Bright actually is, for he was never known to my mother by any other name. She knows him to have been an Englishman, however, and thinks he was, or had been, an upper servant in a gentleman's family.

"JOHN MONDAY."

This paper was dated several years back, a sign that the disposition to do right had existed for some time in the mind of Mr. Monday, and all the letters and other papers had been carefully preserved. They also appeared to be regularly numbered, a precaution that much aided the investigations of the two gentlemen. The original letters all spoke for themselves, and the copies had been made in a clear, strong, mercantile hand, and with the method of one accustomed to business. In short, so far as the contents of the different papers would allow, nothing was wanting to render the whole distinct and intelligible.

John Effingham read the paper, "No. 1," with deliberation, though not aloud, and when he had done, he handed it to his young friend, coolly remarking—"That is the production of a deliberate villain."

Paul glanced his eye over the document, which was an original letter, signed "David Bright," and addressed to "Mrs. Jane Dowse." It was written with exceeding art, made many professions of friendship, spoke of the writer's knowledge of the woman's friends in England, and of her first husband in particular, and professed freely the writer's desire to serve her, while it also contained several ambiguous allusions to certain means of doing so, which should be revealed whenever the person to whom the letter was addressed might discover a willingness to embark in the undertaking. This letter was dated "Philadelphia," and was addressed to one in New York, and it was of old date.

"This is, indeed, a rare specimen of villany," said Paul, as he laid down the paper, "and has been written in some such spirit as that which actuated the devil when he tempted our common mother. I think I never read a better specimen of low, wily cunning."

"And judging by all that we already know, it would seem to have succeeded. In this letter you will find the gentleman a little more explicit, and only a little; though evidently encouraged by the interest and curiosity betrayed by the woman in this copy of the answer to his first epistle."

Paul read the letters just named, and then laid them aside to wait for the next, which was still in the hands of his companion.

"This is likely to prove a history of unlawful love, and of its miserable consequences," said John Effingham, in his cool manner, as he handed the answers to letter "No. 2," and letter "No. 3," to Paul. "The world is full of such unfortunate adventurers, and I should think the parties English, by a hint or two you will find in this very honest and conscientious communication. Strong artificial, social, and political distinctions, render expedients of this nature more frequent, perhaps, in Great Britain than in any other country. Youth is the season of the passions, and many a man, in the thoughtlessness of that period, lays the foundation of bitter regrets for after life."

As John Effingham raised his eyes, in the act of extending his hand towards his companion, he perceived that the fresh, ruddy hue of his embrowned cheek deepened, until the colour diffused itself over the whole of his fine brow. At first, an unpleasant suspicion flashed on John Effingham, and he admitted it with regret, for Eve and her future happiness had become closely associated in his mind with the character and conduct of the young man; but when Paul took the papers steadily, and by an effort seemed to subdue all unpleasant feelings, the calm dignity with which he read them completely effaced the disagreeable distrust. It was then John Effingham remembered that he had once believed Paul himself might be the fruits of the heartless indiscretion he condemned. Commiseration and sympathy instantly took the place of the first impression, and he was so much absorbed with these feelings, that he had not taken up the letter which was to follow, when Paul laid down the papers he had been required to read.

“This does, indeed, sir, seem to foretel one of those painful histories of unbridled passion, with their more painful consequences,” said the young man, with the steadiness of one who was unconscious of having a personal connexion with any event of a nature so unpleasant. “Let us examine farther.”

John Effingham felt emboldened by these encouraging signs of unconcern, and he read the succeeding letters aloud, so that they learned their contents simultaneously. The next six or eight communications betrayed nothing distinctly beyond the fact that the child which formed the subject of the whole correspondence was to be received by Peter Dowse and his wife, and to be retained as their own offspring, for the consideration of a considerable sum, with an additional engagement to pay an annuity. It appeared by these letters, also, that the child, which was hypocritically alluded to under the name of the “pet,” had been actually transferred to the keeping of Jane Dowse, and that several years had passed, after this arrangement, before the correspondence terminated. Most of the latter letters referred to the payment of an annuity, although they all contained cold inquiries of the “pet,” and answers so vague and general, as sufficiently to prove that the name was singularly misapplied. In the whole, there were some thirty or forty letters, each of which had been punctually answered, and their dates covered a space of nearly twelve years.

The perusal of all these papers consumed an hour, and when John Effingham laid his spectacles on the table, the village clock struck the hour of midnight.

“As yet,” he observed, “we have learned little more than the fact that a child was made to take a false character, without possessing any other clew to the circumstances than is given in the names of the parties, all of whom are evidently obscure, and one of the most material of whom, we are plainly told, must have borne a fictitious name. Even poor Monday, in possession of so much collateral testimony that we want, could not have known precisely what injustice was done, if any, or certainly, with the intentions he manifests, he would not have left that important particular in the dark."

"This is likely to prove a complicated affair," returned Paul, "and it is not very clear that we can be of any immediate service. As you are probably fatigued, we may, without impropriety, defer the further examination to another time."

To this John Effingham assented, and Paul, during the short conversation that followed, brought the secretaire from the toilet to the table, along with that bundle of important papers which belonged to himself, to which he had alluded, and was for some time employed in replacing the whole in the drawer from which they had been taken.

"All the formalities about the seals, that were observed when poor Monday gave us his packet, would seem to be unnecessary," he remarked while thus occupied, "and it will probably be sufficient if I leave the secretaire in your room, and keep the keys myself."

"One never knows," returned John Effingham, with the greater caution of experience and age; "we have not yet read all the papers, and there are wax and light before us; each has his watch and seal, and it will be the work of a minute only to replace everything as we left the package originally. When this is done, you may leave the secretaire, or remove it at your own pleasure."

"I will leave it; for though it usually contains so much that I prize, and which is really of great importance to myself, it contains nothing for which I shall have immediate occasion."

"In that case it were better that I place the package, in which we have a common interest, in an armoire, or in that secretaire of my own; and that you keep your own property more immediately under your own eye."

"That is immaterial, unless this case will inconvenience you; for I do not know that I am not happier when it is out of my sight, so long as I feel certain of its security, than when it is constantly before my eyes."

Paul said this with a forced smile, and there was a sadness in his manner and countenance that excited all the sympathy of his companion. The latter, however, merely bowed his assent; the papers were replaced, and the secretaire was locked and deposited in an armoire in silence. Paul was then about to wish the other good night, when John Effingham seized his hand, and by a gentle effort induced him to resume his seat. An embarrassing but short pause succeeded, and the latter spoke.

“We have suffered enough together in company, and have seen each other in situations of sufficient trial to be friends,” he said. “I should feel mortified, did I believe you could think me influenced by an improper curiosity, in wishing to share more of your confidence than you are perhaps willing to bestow, and I trust you will attribute to its right motive the liberty I am now taking. Age makes some difference between us, and the sincere and strong interest I feel in your welfare ought to give me a small claim not to be treated as a total stranger. So jealous and watchful has this interest been—I might with great truth call it affection—that I have discovered you are not situated exactly as other men of your condition in life are situated, and I feel persuaded that the sympathy, perhaps the advice, of one so many years older than yourself, might be useful. You have already said so much to me on the subject of your personal situation, that I almost feel a right to ask to know more.”

John Effingham uttered this in his mildest and most winning manner, and few men could carry with them, on such an occasion, more of persuasion in their voice and look. Paul’s features worked, and it was evident to his companion that he was moved, while at the same time he was not displeased.

“I am grateful, deeply grateful, sir, for this interest in my happiness,” Paul answered; “and if I knew the particular points on which you desire information, there is nothing that I can wish to conceal. Have the further kindness to question me, Mr. Effingham, that I need not touch on things that you do not care to hear.”

“All that really concerns your welfare would have an interest with me. You have been the agent of rescuing not only myself, but those whom I most love, from a fate worse than death; and being a childless bachelor myself, I have more than once thought of attempting to supply the place of those natural friends that I fear you have lost. Your parents——”

“Are both dead. I never knew either,” said Paul, with a melancholy smile, “and will most cheerfully accept your generous offer, if you will allow me to attach to it one condition.”

“Beggars must not be choosers,” returned John Effingham, “and if you will suffer me to feel this interest in you, and occasionally to share in the confidence of a father, I shall not insist on any unreasonable terms. What is your condition?”

“That the word money may be struck out of our vocabulary, and that you leave your will unaltered. Were the world to be examined, you could not find a worthier or a lovelier heiress than the one you have already selected, and whom Providence itself has given. Compared with yourself I am not rich, but I have a gentleman's income; and as I shall probably never marry, it will suffice for all my wants."

John Effingham was more pleased than he cared to express with this frankness, and with the secret sympathy that had existed between them; but he smiled at the injunction, for with Eve's knowledge, and with her father's entire approbation, he had actually made a codicil to his will, in which he had left their young protector one half of his large fortune.

"The will may remain untouched, if you desire it," he answered evasively, "and that condition is disposed of. I am glad to learn so directly from yourself, what your manner of living and the reports of others had prepared me to hear, that you are independent. This fact alone will place us solely on our mutual esteem, and render the friendship that I hope is now brought within a covenant, if not now first established, more equal and frank. You have seen much of the world, Powis, for one of your years and profession."

"It is usual to think that men of my profession see much of the world, as a consequence of their pursuits, though I agree with you, sir, that this is seeing the world only in a very limited circle. It is now several years since circumstances—I might almost say an imperative order of one whom I was bound to obey—induced me to abandon my profession, and since that time I have done little else but travel. Owing to certain adventitious causes, I have enjoyed an access to European society that few of our countrymen possess, and I hope the advantage has not been entirely thrown away. It was as a traveller on the continent of Europe that I had the pleasure of first meeting with Mr. and Miss Effingham. I was much abroad, even as a child, and owe some skill in the foreign languages to that circumstance."

"So my cousin has informed me. You have set the question of your country at rest by declaring that you are an American, and yet I find you have English relatives. Captain Ducie, I believe, is your kinsman?"

"He is; we are sisters' children, though our friendship has not always been such as the connexion would infer. When Ducie and myself met at sea, there was an awkwardness if not a coolness in the interview, that, coupled with my sudden return to England, I fear did not make the strongest impression in my favour on those who witnessed what passed."

"We had confidence in your principles," said John Effingham with a frank simplicity, "and though the first surmises were not pleasant perhaps to any on board, a little reflection told us that there were no just grounds for suspicion."

"Ducie is a fine, manly fellow, and has a seaman's generosity and sincerity: I had last parted from him on the field, where we appeared as enemies; and the circumstance rendered the unexpected meeting awkward. Our wounds no longer smarted, it is true, but, perhaps, we both felt shame and sorrow that they had ever been inflicted."

"It should be a very serious quarrel that could arm sisters, children against each other," said John Effingham gravely.

"I admit as much. But, at that time, Captain Ducie was not disposed to admit the consanguinity, and the offence grew out of an intemperate resentment of some of his imputations on my birth, and, as two military men, the issue could scarcely be avoided. Ducie challenged, and I was not then in a humour to balk him. A couple of flesh wounds happily terminated the affair. But an interval of three years had enabled my enemy to discover that he had not done me justice, that I had been causelessly provoked to the quarrel, and that we ought to be firm friends. The generous desire to make a suitable expiation, urged him to seize the first occasion of coming to America that offered; and when he chased the Montauk, in obedience to a telegraphic communication from London, he was hourly expecting sailing orders for our seas, where he wished to come, expressly that we might meet. You will judge, therefore, how happy he was to find me unexpectedly in the vessel that contained his principal object of pursuit, thus killing, as it might be, two birds with one stone."

"And did he carry you away with any such murderous intention?" demanded John Effingham smiling.

"By no means; nothing could be more amicable than Ducie and myself became when we had been a few hours together in his cabin. As often happens, where there has been violent antipathies and unreasonable prejudices, a nearer view of each other's characters and motives removed every obstacle, and long before we reached England, two warmer friends could not be found, or a more frank intercourse between relatives could not be desired. You are aware, sir, that our English cousins do not often view their cis-Atlantic relatives with the most lenient eyes."

"This is but too true," said John Effingham proudly, though his lip quivered as he spoke, "and it is in a great measure the fault of that miserable mental bondage, which has left this country, after sixty years of nominal independence, so much at the mercy of a hostile foreign opinion. It is necessary that we respect ourselves, in order that others should respect us."

"I agree with you, sir, entirely. In my case, however, previous injustice induced my relatives to receive me better, perhaps, than they might otherwise have been disposed to do. I had little to ask in the way of fortune, and feeling no disposition to raise a question that might disturb the peerage of the Ducies, I became a favourite."

"A peerage!—Both your parents, then, were English?"

"Neither, I believe; but the connexion between the two countries was so close, that it can occasion no surprise that a right of this nature should have passed into the colonies. My mother's mother became the heiress of one of those ancient baronies that pass to the heirs general, and, in consequence of the death of two brothers, these rights, which, however, were never actually possessed by any of the previous generation, centered in my mother and my aunt. The former being dead, as was contended, without issue—"

"You forget yourself!"

"Lawful issue," added Paul, reddening to the temples, "I should have added. Mrs. Ducie, who was married to the younger son of an English nobleman, claimed and obtained the rank. My pretension would have left the peerage in abeyance, and I probably owe some little opposition I found to that circumstance. But after Ducie's generous conduct, I could not hesitate about joining in the application to the crown, that by its decision the abeyance might be determined in favour of the person who was in possession, and Lady Dunluce is now legally confirmed in her claim."

"There are many young men in this country who would cling to the hopes of a British peerage with greater tenacity!"

"It is probable there are; but my self-denial is not of a very high order, for it could scarcely be expected that the English ministers would consent to give the rank to a foreigner, who did not hesitate about avowing his principles and national feelings. I shall not say I did not covet this peerage, for it would be supererogatory; but I am born an American, and will die an American; and an American who even swaggers about such a claim, is like the daw among the peacocks. The less that is said about it the better."

"You are fortunate in having escaped the journals, which most probably would have begraced you, by elevating you at once to the rank of a duke."

"Instead of which, I had no other station than that of the dog in the manger. If it makes my aunt happy to be called Lady Dunluce, I am sure she is welcome to the privilege, and when Ducie succeeds her, as one day will be the case, an excellent fellow will be a peer of England. Voilà tout. You are the only countryman, sir, to whom I have ever spoken of the circumstance, and with you I trust it will remain a secret."

"What! am I precluded from mentioning the facts in my own family? I am not the only sincere, the only warm friend, you have in this house, Powis."

"In that respect I leave you to act according to your own pleasure, my dear sir; if Mr. Effingham feels sufficient interest in my fortunes to wish to hear what I have told you, let there be no silly mysteries; or—or if Mademoiselle Viefville—"

"Or Nanny Sidley, or Annette," interrupted John Effingham, with a kind smile. "Well, trust to me for that; but, before we separate for the night, I wish to ascertain, beyond a question, one other fact, although the circumstances you have stated scarcely leave a doubt of the reply."

"I understand you, sir, and did not intend to leave you in any doubt on that important particular. If there can be a feeling more painful than all others with a man of any pride, it is to distrust the purity of his mother. Mine was beyond reproach, thank God, and so it was most clearly established, or I could certainly have had no legal claim to the peerage."

"Or to your fortune," added John Effingham, drawing a long breath, like one suddenly relieved from an unpleasant suspicion.

"My fortune comes from neither parent, but from one of those generous dispositions, or caprices, if you will, that sometimes induce men to adopt those who are alien to their blood. My guardian adopted me, took me abroad with him, placed me, quite young, in the navy, and finally left me all he possessed. As he was a bachelor, with no near relative, and had been the founder of his own fortune, I could have no hesitation about accepting the gift he so liberally bequeathed. It was coupled with the condition that I should retire from the service, travel for five years, return home, and marry. There is no silly forfeiture exacted in either case, but such is the general course solemnly advised by a man who showed himself my true friend so many years."

"I envy him the opportunity he enjoyed of serving you. I hope he would have approved of your national pride, for I believe we must put that at the bottom of your disinterestedness in the affair of the peerage."

"He would indeed, although he never knew of the claim, which arose out of the death of the two lords who preceded my aunt, and who were the brothers of my grandmother. My guardian was in all respects a man, and in nothing more than in a manly national pride. While abroad, a decoration was offered him, and he declined it with the character and dignity of one who felt that distinctions which his country repudiates, every gentleman belonging to that country ought to reject; yet he did it with a respectful gratitude for the compliment that was due to the government which made the offer."

"I almost envy that man," said John Effingham with warmth. "To have appreciated you, Powis, was a mark of a high judgment; but it seems he properly appreciated himself, his country, and human nature."

"And yet he was little appreciated himself! That man passed years in one of our larger towns, of no more apparent account among its population than any one of its common spirits, and of not half so much as one of its bustling brokers or jobbers."

"In that there is nothing surprising. The class of the chosen few is too small everywhere, to be very numerous at any given point, and more especially so in a scattered population like that of America. The broker will as naturally appreciate the broker as the dog appreciates the dog, or the wolf the wolf. Least of all is the manliness you have named likely to be valued among a people who have been put into men's clothes before they are out of leading strings. I am older than you, my dear Paul,"—it was the first time John Effingham had ever used so familiar an appellation, and the young man thought it sounded kindly—"I am older than you, my dear Paul, and will venture to tell you an important fact, that may hereafter lessen some of your mortifications. In most nations there is a high standard to which men, at least, affect to look; and acts are extolled, and seemingly appreciated, for their naked merit. Little of this exists in America, where no man is much praised for himself, but for the purposes of party, or to feed national vanity. In the country in which, of all others, political opinion ought to be the freest, it is the most persecuted, and the community-character of the nation induces every man to think he has a right of property in all its fame. England exhibits a great deal of this weakness and injustice, which, it is to be feared, is a vicious fruit of liberty, for it is certain that the sacred nature of opinion is most appreciated in those countries in which it has the least efficiency. We are constantly deriding those governments which fetter opinion, and yet I know of no nation in which the expression of opinion is so certain to attract persecution and hostility as our own, though it may be, and is so free by law."

"This arises from its potency. Men quarrel about opinion here because opinion rules. It is but one mode of struggling for power. But to return to my guardian; he was a man to think and act for himself, and as far from the magazine and newspaper existence that most Americans pass, in a moral sense at least, as any man could be."

"It is indeed a newspaper and a magazine existence!" said John Effingham, smiling at Paul's terms. "To know life only through such mediums is as bad as the condition of those English who form their notion of society from novels written by men and women who have no access to it, and from the records of the Court Journal. I thank you sincerely, Mr. Powis, for this confidence, which has not been idly solicited on my part, and which shall not be abused. At no distant day we will break our seals again, and renew our investigations into this affair of the unfortunate Monday, which is not very promising at present in the way of revelations."

The gentlemen shook hands cordially, and Paul, lighted by his companion, withdrew. When the young man was at the door of his room he turned, and saw John Effingham following him with his eye. The latter then repeated the good night with one of those winning smiles that rendered his face so handsome, and each retired.

SHAKSPEARE.

The next day John Effingham made no allusion to the conversation of the previous night, though the squeeze of the hand given to Paul when they met was an assurance that nothing was forgotten. As he had a secret pleasure in obeying any injunction of Eve's, the young man himself sought Captain Truck even before they had breakfasted, and, as he had made an acquaintance with "the commodore" on the lake previously to the arrival of the Effinghams, that worthy was summoned, and regularly introduced to the honest ship-master. The meeting between these two distinguished men was grave, ceremonious, and dignified, each, probably, feeling that he was temporarily the guardian of a particular portion of an element that was equally dear to both. After a few minutes passed, as it might be, in the preliminary points of etiquette, a better feeling and more confidence were established, and it was settled that they should fish in company most of the day, Paul promising to row the ladies out on the lake in the course of the afternoon, if he had influence enough to induce them to accompany him.

As the party quitted the breakfast table, Eve took an occasion to thank the young man for his attention to their common friend, who, it had been reported, had taken his morning's repast at an early hour, and was already on the lake, the day, by this time, having advanced within two hours of noon.

"I have dared even to exceed your instructions, Miss Effingham," said Paul, "for I have promised the captain to endeavour to persuade you, and as many of the ladies as possible, to trust yourselves to my seamanship, and to submit to be rowed to the spot where we shall find him and his friend the commodore riding at anchor, or to repair to the Point for a pic-nic, as you may determine."

"An engagement that my influence shall be used to see fulfilled. Mrs. Bloomfield has already expressed a desire to go on the Otsego water, and I make no doubt I shall find other companions. Once more let me thank you for this little attention, for I too well know your taste not to understand that you might find a more agreeable ward."

"Upon my word I feel a sincere regard for our old captain, and could often wish for no better companion. Were he, however, as disagreeable as I find him, in truth, pleasant and frank, your wishes would conceal his faults."

"You have learned, Mr. Powis, that small attentions are as much remembered as important services, and, after having saved our lives, you wish to prove that you can discharge les petits devoirs sociaux as well as perform great deeds. I trust you will persuade Sir George Templemore to be of our party, and at four we shall be ready to accompany you; until then I am contracted to a gossip with Mrs. Bloomfield in her dressing-room."

We shall now leave the party on the land, and follow those who have already taken boat, or the fishermen. The beginning of the intercourse between the salt-water navigator and his fresh-water companion was again a little constrained and critical. Their professional terms agreed as little as possible, for when the captain used the expression, "ship the oars," the commodore understood just the reverse of what it had been intended to express; and once, when he told his companion to "give way," the latter took the hint so literally as actually to cease his efforts. All these little niceties induced the worthy ship-master to undervalue his companion, who, in the main, was very skilful in his particular pursuit, though it was a skill that he exerted after the fashions of his own lake, and not after the fashions of the ocean. Owing to several contre-temps of this nature, by the time they reached the fishing ground, the captain began to entertain a feeling for the commodore that ill comported with the deference due to his titular rank.

“I have come out with you, commodore,” said Captain Truck, when they had got to their station, and laying a peculiar emphasis on the appellation he used, “in order to enjoy myself, and you will confer an especial favour on me by not using such phrases as ‘cable-rope,’ ‘casting anchor,’ and ‘titivating.’ As for the two first, no seaman ever uses them, and I never heard such a word on board ship as the last. D—e, if I believe it is to be found in the dictionary even.”

“You amaze me, sir! ‘casting anchor’ and ‘cable-rope’ are both Bible phrases, and they must be right.”

“That by no means follows, commodore, as I have some reason to know, for my father having been a parson, and I being a seaman, we may be said to have the whole subject in the family. St. Paul—you have heard of such a man as St. Paul, commodore?”

“I know him almost as well as I know this lake, sir; but St. Peter and St. Andrew were the men most after my heart. Ours is an ancient calling, sir, and in those two instances you see to what a fisherman can rise. I do not remember to have ever heard of a sea captain who was converted into a saint.”

“Ay, ay; there is always too much to do on board ship, to leave time to be much more than a beginner in religion. There was my mate, v’y’ge before last, Tom Leach, who is now master of a ship of his own, had he been brought up to it properly, he would have made as conscientious a parson as his grandfather before him did. Such a man would have been a seaman, as well as a parson. I have little to say against St. Peter or St. Andrew, but in my judgment they are none the better for having been fishermen; and, if the truth were known, I dare say they were at the bottom of introducing such lubberly phrases into the Bible as ‘casting anchor’ and ‘cable-rope.’

“Pray, sir,” asked the commodore with dignity, “what are you in the practice of saying when you speak of such matters?—for, to be frank with you, we always use such terms on these lakes.”

“That I can believe, for there is a strong fresh-water smell about them. We say ‘anchor,’ or ‘let go the anchor,’ or ‘drop the anchor,’ or some such reasonable expression; and not ‘cast anchor,’ as if a bit of iron, weighing two or three tons, is to be jerked about like a stone big enough to kill a bird with. As for the ‘cable-rope,’ as you call it, we say the ‘cable,’ or ‘the chain,’ or the ‘ground tackle,’ according to reason and circumstances. You never heard a real ‘salt’ flourishing his ‘cable-ropes,’ and his 'casting anchor,' which are altogether too sentimental and particular for his manner of speaking. As for 'ropes,' I suppose you have not got to be a commodore, and need being told how many there are in a ship."

"I do not pretend to have counted them, but I have seen a ship, sir, and under full sail, and I know there were as many ropes about her as there are pines on the Vision."

"Are there more than seven of these trees on your mountain? for that is just the number of ropes in a merchant-man, though a man-of-war's-man counts one or two more."

"You astonish me, sir! Only seven ropes in a ship?—I should have said there are seven hundred!"

"I dare say—I dare say; that is just the way in which a landsman pretends to criticise a vessel. As for the ropes, I will now give you their names, and then you can lay athwart hawse of these canoe gentry by the hour, and teach them their grammar, as well as a little modesty, and both at the same time too. In the first place," continued the captain, jerking uselessly at his line, and then beginning to count on his fingers, "there is the 'man-rope,' then come the 'bucket-rope,' the 'tiller-rope,' the 'bolt-rope,' the 'foot-rope,' the 'top-rope,' and the 'limber-rope.' I have followed the seas now more than half a century, and never yet heard of a 'cable-rope' from any one who could hand, reef, and steer."

"Well, sir, every man to his trade," said the commodore, who just then pulled in a fine pickerel, which was the third he had taken, while his companion rejoiced in no more than in a few fruitless bites, "you are more expert in ropes than in lines, it would seem. I shall not deny your experience and knowledge, but, in the way of fishing, you will at least allow that the sea is no great school. I dare say, now, if you were to hook the 'sog-dollager,' we should have you jumping into the lake to get rid of him. Probably, sir, you never even heard of that celebrated fish."

Now, notwithstanding the many excellent qualities of Captain Truck, he had a weakness that is rather peculiar to a class of men who, having seen so much of this earth, are unwilling to admit they have not seen it all. The little brush he was now engaged in with the commodore he conceived due to his own dignity, and his motive was duly to impress his companion with his superiority, which having been fairly admitted, he would have been ready enough to acknowledge that the other understood pike-fishing much better than himself. But it was quite too early in the discussion to make any such avowal, and the supercilious remarks of the commodore putting him on his mettle, he was ready to affirm he had eaten "sogdollagers" for breakfast, a month at a time; had it been necessary.

"Pooh! pooh! man," returned the captain, with an air of cool indifference, "you do not surely fancy that you have anything in a lake like this, that is not to be found in the ocean? If you were to see a whale's flukes threshing your puddle, every cruiser among you would run for a port, and as for 'sogdollagers,' we think little of them in salt water; the flying fish, or even the dry dolphin, being much the best eating."

"Sir," said the commodore, with some heat, and a great deal of emphasis, "there is but one 'sogdollager' in the world, and he is in this lake. No man has ever seen him but my predecessor, the 'Admiral,' and myself."

"Bah!" ejaculated the captain; "they are as plenty as soft clams in the Mediterranean, and the Egyptians use them as a pan fish. In the East they catch them to bait with for hallibut and other middling sized creatures, that are particular about their diet. It is a good fish, I own, as is seen in this very circumstance."

"Sir," repeated the commodore, flourishing his hand, and waxing warm with his earnestness, "there is but one sogdollager in the universe, and that is in Lake Otsego! The sogdollager is a salmon trout, and a species; a sort of father to all the salmon trout in this part of the world; a scaly patriarch."

"I make no doubt your sogdollager is scaly enough; but what is the use of wasting words about such a trifle? A whale is the only fish fit to occupy a gentleman's thoughts. As long as I have been at sea, I have never witnessed the taking of more than three whales."

This allusion happily preserved the peace; for if there were anything in the world for which the commodore entertained a profound but obscure reverence, it was for a whale. He even thought better of a man for having actually seen one gambolling in the freedom of the ocean, and his mind became suddenly oppressed by the glory of a mariner who had passed his life among such gigantic animals. Shoving back his cap, the old man gazed steadily at the captain a minute, and his displeasure about the "sogdollagers" vanished, though in his inmost mind he set down all that the other had told him on that particular subject as so many parts of a regular "fish story."

"Captain Truck," he said, with solemnity, "I acknowledge myself to be but an ignorant and inexperienced man, one who has passed his life on this lake, which, broad and beautiful as it is, must seem a pond in the eyes of a seaman like yourself, who have passed your days on the Atlantic."

“Atlantic!” interrupted the captain contemptuously; “I should have but a poor opinion of myself had I seen nothing but the Atlantic! Indeed, I never can believe I am at sea at all on the Atlantic, the passages between New York and Portsmouth being little more than so much canalling along a tow-path. If you wish to say anything about oceans, talk of the Pacific, or of the great South Sea, where a man may run a month with a fair wind, and hardly go from island to island. Indeed, that is an ocean in which there is a manufactory of islands, for they turn them off in lots to supply the market, and of a size to suit customers.”

“A manufactory of islands!” repeated the commodore, who began to entertain an awe of his companion that he never expected to feel for any human being on Lake Otsego; “are you certain, sir, there is no mistake in this?”

“None in the least; not only islands, but whole archipelagos, are made annually by the sea insects in that quarter of the world; but then you are not to form your notions of an insect in such an ocean by the insects you may find in such a bit of water as this.”

“As big as our pickerel, or salmon, I dare say,” returned the commodore, in the simplicity of his heart; for by this time his local and exclusive conceit was thoroughly humbled, and he was ready to believe almost anything.

“I say nothing of their size, for it is to their numbers and industry that I principally allude. Now, a solitary shark, I dare say, would set your whole lake in commotion?”

“I think we might manage a shark, sir. I once saw one of these animals, and I do really believe the sogdollager would outweigh him. I do think we might manage a shark, sir.”

“Ay, you mean an inshore, high-latitude fellow; but what would you say to a shark as long as one of those pines on the mountains?”

“Such a monster would take in a man, whole?”

“A man! He would take in a platoon, Indian file. I dare say one of those pines, now, may be thirty or forty feet high!” A gleam of intelligence and of exultation shot across the weather-beaten face of the old fisherman, for he detected a weak spot in the other’s knowledge. The worthy captain, with that species of exclusiveness which generally accompanies excellence in any one thing, was quite ignorant of most matters that pertained to the land. That there should be a tree, so far inland, that was longer than his main-yard, he did not think probable, although that yard itself was made of part of a tree, and in the laudable intention of impressing his companion with the superiority of a real seaman over a fresh-water navigator, he had inadvertently laid bare a weak spot in his estimate of heights and distances, that the commodore seized upon with some such avidity as the pike seizes the hook. This accidental mistake alone saved the latter from an abject submission, for the cool superiority of the captain had so far deprived him of his conceit, that he was almost ready to acknowledge himself no better than a dog, when he caught a glimpse of light through this opening.

“There is not a pine that can be called of age on all that mountain which is not more than a hundred feet high, and many are nearer two,” he cried in exultation, flourishing his hand furiously. “The sea may have its big monsters, captain, but our hills have their big trees. Did you ever see a shark of half that length?”

Now Captain Truck was a man of truth, although so much given to occasional humorous violations of its laws, and withal a little disposed to dwell upon the marvels of the great deep in the spirit of exaggeration, and he could not in conscience affirm anything so extravagant as this. He was accordingly obliged to admit his mistake, and from this moment the conversation was carried on with a greater regard to equality. They talked, as they fished, of politics, religion, philosophy, human nature, the useful arts, abolition, and most other subjects that would be likely to interest a couple of Americans, who had nothing to do but to twitch, from time to time, at two lines dangling in the water. Although few people possess less of the art of conversation than our own countrymen, no other nation takes so wide a range in its discussions. He is but a very indifferent American that does not know, or thinks he knows, a little of everything, and neither of our worthies was in the least backward in supporting the claims of the national character in this respect. This general discussion completely restored amity between the parties, for, to confess the truth, our old friend the captain was a little rebuked about the affair of the tree. The only peculiarity worthy of notice, that occurred in the course of their various digressions, was the fact that the commodore insensibly began to style his companion “general,”—the usages of the country, in his eyes, appearing to require that a man who had seen so much more than himself, should at least enjoy a title equal to his own in rank, and that of admiral being proscribed by the sensitiveness of republican principles.

After fishing a few hours, the old laker pulled the skiff up to the Point so often mentioned, when he lighted a fire on the grass, and prepared dinner. When everything was ready, the two seated themselves, and began to enjoy the fruits of their labours, in a way that will be understood by all sportsmen.

“I have never thought of asking you, general,” said the commodore, as he began to masticate a perch, "whether you are an aristocrat or democrat. We have had the government pretty much upside down, too, this morning, but this question has escaped me."

"As we are here, by ourselves, under these fine oaks, and talking like two old messmates," returned the general, with his mouth half filled, "I shall just own the truth, and make no bones of it. I have been captain of my own ship so long, that I have a most thorough contempt for all equality. It is a vice that I deprecate, and, whatever may be the laws of this country, I am of opinion that equality is nowhere borne out by the law of nations; which, after all, commodore, is the only true law for a gentleman to live under."

"That is the law of the strongest, if I understand the matter, general?"

"But reduced to rules. The law of nations, to own the truth to you, is full of categories, and this gives an enterprising man an opportunity to make his fortune. Would you believe, commodore, that there are countries in which they lay taxes on tobacco?"

"Taxes on tobacco! Sir, I never heard of such an act of oppression under the form of law! What has tobacco done, that any one should think of taxing it?"

"I believe, commodore, that its greatest offence is being so general a favourite. Taxation, I have found, is different from most other things, generally attacking that which men most prize."

"This is quite new too, general. A tax on tobacco! The law-makers in those countries cannot chew. I drink to your good health, sir, and many happy returns to such banquets at this."

Here the commodore raised to his lips a large silver punch-bowl, which Pierre had furnished, and fastening his eyes on the boughs of a gnarled oak, for near a minute, like a man who was intently taking an observation. All this time the captain regarded him with sympathetic pleasure, and when the bowl was free, he imitated the example, levelling his own eye at a cloud, that seemed floating at an angle of forty-five degrees above him, expressly for that purpose.

"That is a lazy cloud!" exclaimed the general, as he let go his hold, to catch breath; "I have been watching it near a minute, and it has not moved so much as an inch."

"Tobacco!" repeated the commodore, drawing a long breath, as if he was just recovering the play of his lungs. "I should as soon think of laying a tax on punch. The country that pursues such a policy must, sooner or later, meet with a downfall. I never knew good come out of persecution."

"I find you are a sensible man, commodore, and regret I did not make your acquaintance earlier in life. Have you yet made up your mind on the subject of religious faith?"

"Why, my dear general, not to be nibbling, like a sucker with a sore mouth, with a person of your liberality, I shall give you a plain history of my adventures, in the way of experiences, that you may judge for yourself. I was born an Episcopalian, if one can say so, but was converted to Presbyterianism at twenty. I stuck to this denomination about five years, when I thought I would try the Baptists, having got to be fond of the water, by this time. At thirty-two I fished a while in company with the Methodists, since which conversion, I have chosen to worship God pretty much by myself out here on the lake."

"Do you consider it any harm to hook a fish on a Sunday?"

"No more than it is to eat a fish on a Sunday. I go altogether by faith in my religion, general; for they talked so much to me of the uselessness of works, that I've got to be very unparticular as to what I do. Your people who have been converted four or five times, are like so many pickerel, which snap at every hook."

"This is very much my case. Now on the river—of course you know where the river is?"

"Certainly," said the commodore; "it is at the foot of the lake."

"My dear commodore, when we say 'the river,' we always mean the Connecticut; and I'm surprised a man of your sagacity should require to be told this. There are people on the river who contend that a ship should heave-to of a Sunday. They did talk of getting up an Anti-Sunday-Sailing Society, but the ship-masters were too many for them, as they threatened to start a Society to put down the growing of 'inyens' (the captain would use this pronunciation,) except of week days. Well, I started in life on the platform tack, in the way of religion, and I believe I shall stand on the same course, till orders come to 'cast anchor,' as you call it. With you, I hold out for faith, as the one thing needful. Pray, my good friend, what are your real sentiments concerning Old Hickory?"

"Tough, sir—tough as a day in February on this lake. All fins, and gills, and bones."

"That is the justest character I have yet heard of the old gentleman, and it says a great deal in a few words. No category about it. I hope the punch is to your liking?"

On this hint the old fisherman raised the bowl to his lips a second time, and renewed the agreeable duty of letting its contents flow down his throat in a pleasant stream. This time he took aim at a gull that was sailing over his head, only relinquishing the draught as the bird settled into the water. The "general" was more particular ; for, selecting a stationary object on the top of an oak that grew on the mountain near him, he studied it with an admirable abstruseness of attention, until the last drop was drained. As soon as this startling fact was mentioned, however, both the convives set about repairing the accident by squeezing lemons, sweetening water, and mixing liquors, secundum artem. At the same instant, each lighted a cigar, and the conversation, for some time, was carried on between their teeth.

"We have been so frank with each other to-day, my excellent commodore," said Captain Truck, "that did I know your true sentiments concerning Temperance Societies, I should look on your inmost soul as a part of myself. By these free communications men get really to know each other."

"If liquor is not made to be drunk, for what is it made? Any one may see that this lake was made for skiffs and fishing. It has a length, breadth, and depth suited to such purposes. Now, here is liquor distilled, bottled, and corked; and I ask if all does not show that it was made to be drunk? I dare say your temperance men are ingenious, but let them answer that, if they can."

"I wish from my heart, my dear sir, we had known each other fifty years since. That would have brought you acquainted with salt water, and left nothing to be desired in your character. We think alike, I believe, in everything but on the virtues of fresh water. Now, if these temperance people had their way, we should all be turned into so many Turks, who never taste wine, and yet marry a dozen wives."

"One of the great merits of fresh water, general, is what I call its mixable quality."

"There would be an end to Saturday nights, too, which are the seaman's tea-parties."

"I question if many of them fish in the rain from sunrise to sunset."

"Or stand their watches in wet pee-jackets from sunset to sunrise. Splicing the mainbrace at such times is the very quintessence of human enjoyments."

"If liquors were not made to be drunk," said the commodore, logically, "I would again ask, for what are they made? Let the temperance men get over that difficulty, if they can."

"Commodore, I wish you twenty more good hearty years of fishing in this lake, which grows each instant more beautiful in my eyes, as I confess does the whole earth; and, to show you that I say no more than I think, I will clench it with a draught."

Captain Truck now brought his right eye to bear on the new moon, which happened to be at a convenient height, closed the left one, and continued in that attitude until the commodore began seriously to think that he was to get nothing besides the lemon seeds for his share. This apprehension, however, could only arise from ignorance of his companion's character, than whom a juster man, according to the notions of ship-masters, did not live; and had one measured the punch that was left in the bowl, when this draught was ended, he would have found that precisely one half of it was still untouched, to a thimbleful. The commodore now had his turn, and, before he got through, the stand of the vessel was as much uppermost as the butt of a clubbed firelock. As the honest fisherman took breath after this exploit, and lowered his eyes from the vault of heaven to the surface of earth, he caught a view of a boat crossing the lake, coming from the Silent Pine to that Point, on which they were enjoying so many agreeable hallucinations on the subject of temperance.

"Yonder is the party from the Wigwam," he said, "and they will be just in time to become converts to our opinions, if they have any doubts on the subjects we have discussed. Shall we give up the ground by taking to the skiff, or do you feel disposed to face the women?"

"Under ordinary circumstances, commodore, I should prefer your society to all the petticoats in the state, but there are two ladies in that party, either of whom I would marry any day at a minute's warning."

"Sir," said the commodore with a tone of warning, "we, who have lived bachelors so long, and are wedded to the water, ought never to speak lightly on so grave a subject."

"Nor do I. Two women, one of whom is twenty, and the other seventy, and hang me if I know which I prefer."

"You would soonest be rid of the last, my dear general, and my advice is, to take her."

"Old as she is, sir, a king would have to plead hard to get her consent. We will make them some punch, that they may see we were mindful of them in their absence."

To work these worthies went in earnest, in order to anticipate the arrival of the party, and as the different compounds were being mingled the conversation did not flag. By this time both the salt-water and the fresh-water sailor were in that condition when men are apt to think aloud, and the commodore had lost all awe of his companion.

"To tell you my mind without any concealment, my dear sir," said he, "my only objection to you is, that you are not of the middle states. I admit the good qualities of the Yankees in a general way, and yet they are the very worst neighbours that a man can have."

"This a new character of them, commodore, as they generally pass for the best in their own eyes : I should like to hear you explain your meaning."

"I call him a bad neighbour who never remains long enough in a place to love anything but himself. Now, sir, I have a feeling for every pebble on the shore of this lake, a sympathy with every wave." Here the commodore began to twirl his hand about, with all the fingers standing apart, like so many spikes in a chevaux-de-frise; "and each hour, as I row across it, I find I like it better; and yet, sir, would you believe me, I often go away of a morning to pass the day on the water, and, on returning at night, find half the houses filled with new faces."

"What becomes of the old ones?" demanded Captain Truck, for this, it struck him, was getting the better of him with his own weapons. "Do you mean that the people come and go like the tides?"

"Exactly so, sir; just as it used to be with the herrings in the Otsego, before the Susquehannah was dammed, and as it still is with the swallows."

"Well, well, my good friend, take consolation. You'll meet all the faces you ever saw here one day in heaven."

"Never; not a man of them will stay there, if there be such a thing as moving. Depend upon it, sir," added the commodore gravely, in the simplicity of his heart, "heaven is no place for a Yankee, if, by hook or by crook, he can get farther west. They are all too uneasy for any steady occupation. You, who are a navigator, must know something concerning the stars; is there such a thing as another world, that lies west of this?"

"That can hardly be, commodore, since the points of the compass only refer to objects on this earth. You know, I suppose, that a man, starting from this spot, and travelling due west, would arrive in time at this very point, coming in from the east; so that what is west to us in the heavens on this side of the world, is east to those on the other."

"This I confess I did not know, general. I have understood that what is good in one man's eyes, will be bad in another's, but never before have I heard that what is west to one man, lies east to another. I am afraid, general, that there is a little of the sog-dollager bait in this?"

"Not enough, sir, to catch the merest fresh-water gudgeon that swims. No, no; there is neither east nor west off the earth, nor any up-and-down; and so we Yankees must try and content ourselves with heaven. Now commodore, hand me the bowl, and we will go down to the shore, and offer the ladies our homage and some punch."

CHAPTER XX.

O Romeo, Romeo, wherefore art thou Romeo!—

Romeo and Juliet.

The usual effect of punch is to cause people to see double, but on this occasion the mistake was the other way, for two boats had touched the strand instead of the one announced by the commodore, and they brought with them the whole party from the Wigwam, Steadfast and Aristobulus included. A domestic or two had also been brought to prepare the customary repast.

Captain Truck was as good as his word, as respects the punch, and the beverage was offered to each of the ladies, in form, as soon as her feet had touched the green sward that covers that beautiful spot. Mrs. Hawker declined drinking, in a way to delight the gallant seaman, for so completely had she gotten the better of all his habits and prejudices, that everything she did seemed right and gracious in his eyes.

The party soon separated into groups, or pairs, some being seated on the margin of the limpid waters, enjoying the light cool airs by which it was fanned, others lay off in the boats fishing, while the remainder plunged into the woods, that, in their native wildness, bounded the little spot of verdure, which, canopied by old oaks, formed the spot so recently the subject of controversy. In this manner an hour or two soon slipped away, when a summons was given for all to assemble around the viands.

The repast was laid on the grass, notwithstanding Aristobulus more than hinted that the public usually saw fit to introduce rude tables for that purpose. The Messrs. Effingham, however, were not to be taught by a mere bird of passage how a rustic fête, so peculiarly their own, ought to be conducted, and the attendants were directed to spread the dishes on the turf. Around this spot rustic seats were improvisés, and the business of restauration proceeded. Of all there assembled, the Parisian feelings of Mademoiselle Vieffville were the most excited, for to her the scene was one of pure delight, with the noble panorama of forest-clad mountains, the mirror-like lake, the overshadowing oaks, and the tangled brakes of the adjoining woods.

genre!" she exclaimed with energy. "On passerait volontiers par les dangers du désert pour y parvenir."

Those who understood her smiled at this characteristic remark, and most felt disposed to join in the enthusiasm. Still, the manner in which their companions expressed the happiness they felt, appeared tame and unsatisfactory to Mr. Bragg and Mr. Dodge, these two persons being accustomed to see the young of the two sexes indulge in broader exhibitions of merry-makings than those in which it comported with the taste and habits of the present party to indulge. In vain Mrs. Hawker, in her quiet dignified way, enjoyed the ready wit and masculine thoughts of Mrs. Bloomfield, appearing to renew her youth; or Eve, with her sweet simplicity, cultivated mind, and improved tastes, seemed like a highly polished mirror, to throw back the flashes of thought and memory that so constantly gleamed before both; all was lost on these thoroughly matter-of-fact utilitarians. Mr. Effingham, all courtesy and mild refinement, was seldom happier, and John Effingham was never more pleasant, for he had laid aside the severity of his character, to appear, what he ought always to have been, a man in whom intelligence and quickness of thought could be made to seem secondary to the gentler qualities. The young men were not behind their companions, each in his particular way appearing to advantage, gay, regulated, and full of humour, rendered so much the more agreeable by drawing its images from a knowledge of the world tempered by observation and practice.

Poor Grace was the only one of the whole party, always excepting Aristobulus and Steadfast, who, for those fleeting but gay hours, was not thoroughly happy. For the first time in her life she felt her own deficiencies; that ready and available knowledge so exquisitely feminine in its nature and exhibition, which escaped Mrs. Bloomfield and Eve, as it might be, from its own excess, which the former possessed almost intuitively—a gift of heaven, and which the latter enjoyed not only from the same source, but as a just consequence of her long and steady self-denial, application, and a proper appreciation of her duties to herself: this was denied one who, in ill-judged compliance with the customs of a society that had no other apparent aim than the love of display, had precluded herself from enjoyments that none but the intellectual can feel. Still Grace was beautiful and attractive, and though she wondered where her cousin, in general so simple and unpretending, had acquired all those stores of thought that in the abandon and freedom of such a fête escaped her in rich profusion, embellished with ready allusions, and a brilliant though chastened wit, her generous and affectionate heart could permit her to wonder without envying. She perceived, for the first time, on this occasion, that if Eve were indeed a Hajji, it was not a Hajji of a common school; and while her modesty and self-abasement led her bitterly to regret the hours irretrievably wasted in the frivolous levities so common to those of her sex with whom she had been most accustomed to mingle, her sincere regret did not lessen her admiration for one she began so tenderly to love.

As for Messrs. Dodge and Bragg, they both determined in their own minds that this was much the most stupid entertainment they had ever seen on that spot, for it was entirely destitute of loud laughing, noisy merriment, coarse witticism, and practical jokes. To them, indeed, it appeared the height of arrogance for any particular set of persons to presume to come to a spot rendered sacred by the public suffrage in its favour in order to indulge in such dog-in-the-mangerisms, that no one else could enjoy.

Towards the close of this gay repast, and when the party were about to yield their places to the attendants, who were ready to re-ship the utensils, John Effingham, observed—

“I trust, my dear Mrs. Hawker, you have been duly warned of the fatal character of this Point, on which woman is said never to have been wooed in vain. Here are Captain Truck and myself, ready at any moment to use these carving-knives, faute des Bowies, in order to show our desperate devotion, and I deem it no more than prudent in you not to smile again this day, lest the cross-readings of jealousy should impute it to a wrong motive.”

“Had the injunction been against laughing, sir, I might have resisted, but smiles are far too feeble to express one’s approbation on such a day as this; you may, therefore, trust to my discretion. Is it then true that Hymen courts these shades?”

“A bachelor’s history of the progress of love may be, like his education of his children, distrusted; but so sayeth tradition; and I never put foot in the place without making fresh vows of constancy to myself. After this announcement of the danger, dare you accept an arm? for I perceive signs that life cannot be entirely wasted in these pleasures, great as they may prove.”

The whole party arose, and separating into groups or pairs, they again strolled along the pebbly strand, or beneath the trees, while the attendants made their preparations to depart. Accident, as much as design, left Sir George and Grace alone, though neither observed the circumstance until they had passed a little rise in the formation of the ground, and were beyond the sight of their companions. The baronet was the first to perceive how much he had been favoured by fortune, and his feelings were touched by the air of gentle melancholy that shaded the usually bright and brilliant countenance of the beautiful girl.

"I should have thrice enjoyed this pleasant day," he said, with an interest in his manner that caused the heart of Grace to beat quicker, "had I not seen that to you it has been less productive of satisfaction than to most of those around you. I fear you may not be as well as usual?"

"In health, never better, though not in spirits, perhaps."

"I could wish I had a right to inquire why you, who have so little cause in general to be out of spirits, should have chosen a moment so little in accordance with the common feeling."

"I have chosen no moment; the moment has chosen me, I fear. Never until this day, Sir George Templemore, have I ever been truly sensible of my great inferiority to my cousin Eve."

"An inferiority that no one but yourself would observe or mention."

"No, I am neither vain enough nor ignorant enough to be the dupe of this flattery," returned Grace, shaking her handsome head, while she forced a smile; for even the delusion which those we love pour into our ears is not without its charms. "When I first met my cousin, after her return, my own imperfections rendered me blind to her superiority; but she herself has gradually taught me to respect her mind, her womanly character, her tact, her delicacy, principles, breeding, everything that can make a woman estimable or worthy to be loved! Oh! how have I wasted in childish amusement and frivolous vanities the precious moments of that girlhood which can never be recalled, and left myself scarcely worthy to be an associate of Eve Effingham!"

The pent feelings of Grace had so far gotten the control that she scarce knew what she said, or to whom she was speaking, and she wrung her hands in the momentary bitterness of her regrets in a way to arouse all the sympathy of a lover.

"No one but yourself would say this, Miss Van Courtlandt, and least of all your admirable cousin."

"She is, indeed, my admirable cousin! But what are we in comparison with such a woman? Simple and unaffected as a child, with the intelligence of a scholar; with all the graces of a woman, she has the learning and mind of a man. Mistress of so many languages.—"

"But you, too, speak several, my dear Miss Van Courtlandt."

"Yes," said Grace, bitterly, "I speak them as the parrot repeats words that he does not understand. But Eve Effingham has used these languages as means, and she does not tell you what such a phrase or idiom means, but what the greatest writers have thought and written."

"No one has a more profound respect for your cousin than myself, Miss Van Courtlandt, but justice to you requires that I should say her great superiority over yourself has escaped me."

"This may be true, Sir George Templemore, and for a long time it escaped me too. I have only learned to prize her as she ought to be prized by an intimate acquaintance, hour by hour, as it might be. But even you must have observed how quick and intuitively my cousin and Mrs. Bloomfield have understood each other to-day; how much extensive reading, and what polished tastes they have both shown, and all so truly feminine! Mrs. Bloomfield is a remarkable woman, but she loves these exhibitions, for she knows she excels in them. Not so with Eve Effingham, who, while she so thoroughly enjoys everything intellectual, is content always to seem so simple. Now, it happens that the conversation turned once to-day on a subject that my cousin, no later than yesterday, fully explained to me at my own earnest request, and I observed that, while she joined so naturally with Mrs. Bloomfield in adding to our pleasure, she kept back half her knowledge, lest she might seem to surpass her friend. No—no—no—there is no such other woman as Eve Effingham in this world!"

"So keen a perfection of excellence in others denotes an excellence in yourself."

"I know my own great inferiority now, and no kindness of yours, Sir George Templemore, can ever persuade me into a better opinion of myself. Eve has travelled, seen much in Europe that does not exist here, and instead of passing her youth in girlish trifling, has treated the minutes as if they were all precious, as she knew them to be."

"If Europe, then, does indeed possess these advantages, why not yourself visit it, dearest Miss Van Courtlandt?"

"I—I a Hajji!" cried Grace with childish delight, though her colour heightened, and for a moment Eve and her superiority were forgotten.

Certainly, Sir George Templemore did not come out on the lake that day with any expectation of offering his baronetcy, his fair estate, with his hand, to this artless, half educated, provincial, but beautiful girl. For a long time he had been debating with himself the propriety of such a step, and it is probable that at some later period he would have sought an occasion, had not one now so opportunely offered, notwithstanding all his doubts and reasonings with himself. If the "woman who hesitates is lost," it is equally true that the man who pretends to set up his reason alone against beauty, is certain to find sense less powerful than the senses. Had Grace Van Courtlandt been more sophisticated, less natural, her beauty alone might have failed to make this conquest; but the baronet found a charm in her naïveté, that was singularly winning on the feelings of a man of the world. Eve had first attracted him by the same quality, the early education of American females being less constrained and artificial than that of the English; but in Eve he found a mental training and acquisitions that left the quality less conspicuous, perhaps, than in her scarcely less beautiful cousin, though, had Eve met his admiration with anything like sympathy, her power over him would not have been easily weakened. As it was, Grace had been gradually winding herself around his affections, and he now poured out his love in language that her unpractised and already favourably disposed feelings had no means of withstanding. A very few minutes were allowed to them before the summons to the boat, but when this summons came, Grace rejoined the party, elevated in her own good opinion, as happy as a cloudless future could make her, and without a thought of the immeasurable superiority of her cousin. By a singular coincidence, while the baronet and Grace were thus engaged on one part of the shore, Eve was the subject of a similar proffer on another. She had left the circle, attended by Paul, her father, and Aristobulus, but no sooner had they reached the margin of the water, than the two former were called away by Captain Truck, to settle some controverted point between the latter and the commodore. By this unlooked for desertion, Eve found herself alone with Mr. Bragg.

"That was a funny and comprehensive remark, Mr. John made about the 'Point,' Miss Eve," Aristobulus commenced, as soon as he found himself in possession of the ground. "I should like to know if it be really true that no woman was ever unsuccessfully wooed beneath these oaks? If such be the case, we gentlemen ought to be cautious how we come here."

Here Aristobulus simpered, and looked if possible more amiable than ever, though the quiet composure and womanly dignity of Eve, (who respected herself too much, and too well knew what was due to her sex, ever to enter into, or, so far as it depended on her will, to permit, any of that common-place and vulgar trifling about love and matrimony, which formed a never-failing theme between the youthful of the two sexes in Mr. Bragg's particular circle,) sensibly curbed his ambitious hopes. Still he thought he had made too good an opening not to pursue the subject.

"Mr. John Effingham sometimes indulges in pleasantries," Eve quietly answered, "that would lead one far astray who might attempt to follow."

"Love is a Jack-a-lantern," rejoined Aristobulus, sentimentally, "that I admit; and it is no wonder so many get swamped in following his lights, which are not the lights of reason. Have you ever felt the tender passion, Miss Eve?"

Now, Aristobulus had heard this precise question put at the soirée of Mrs. Houston half a dozen times, and he believed himself to be in the most polite train for a regular declaration. An ordinary woman, who felt herself offended by this question, would most probably have stepped back, and raising her form to its utmost elevation, answered by an emphatic "Sir!" Not so with Eve. She felt the distance between Mr. Bragg and herself to be so great, that by no probable means could he even offend her by any assumption of equality. This distance was the result of opinions, habits, and education, rather than of condition, however; for though Eve Effingham could become the partner of a gentleman only, she was entirely superior to those prejudices of the world that depend on purely factitious causes. Instead of discovering surprise, indignation, or dramatic dignity, therefore, at this extraordinary question, she barely permitted a smile to curl her handsome mouth, and this so slightly as to escape her companion's eye.

"I believe we are to be favoured with as smooth water, in returning to the village, as we had in the morning, while coming to this place," she simply said. "You row sometimes, I think, Mr. Bragg?"

"Ah! Miss Eve, such another opportunity may never occur again, for you foreign ladies are so difficult of access! Let me then seize this happy moment, here, beneath the hymeneal oaks, to offer you this faithful hand and this willing heart. Of fortune you will have enough for both, and I say nothing about the miserable dross. Reflect, Miss Eve, how happy we might be in protecting and soothing the old age of your excellent father, and in going down the hill of life in company; or as the song says,

"And hand in hand we'll go,
And sleep the 'gither at the foot,
John Anderson, my Joe."

"You draw very agreeable pictures, Mr. Bragg, and with the touches of a master!"

"However agreeable you find them, Miss Eve, they fall infinitely short of the truth. The tie of wedlock, besides being the most sacred of life, is also the dearest, and happy indeed are they who enter into the solemn engagement with such cheerful prospects as ourselves. Our ages are perfectly suitable, our dispositions entirely consonant, our habits so similar as to obviate all unpleasant changes, and our fortunes precisely what they ought to be to render a marriage happy, with confidence on one side, and gratitude on the other. As to the day, Miss Eve, I could wish to leave you altogether the mistress of that, and shall not be urgent. It is the privilege of your sex."

Eve had often heard John Effingham comment on the cool impudence of a particular portion of the American population, with great amusement to herself, but never did she expect to be the subject of an attack like this in her own person. By way of rendering the scene perfect, Aristobulus had taken out his penknife, cut a twig from a bush, and he now rendered himself doubly interesting by commencing the favourite occupation of whittling. A better picture of a rational passion could not well have been drawn.

"You are bashfully silent, Miss Eve—I make all due allowances for natural timidity, and shall say no more at present; though, 'as silence gives consent'——"

"If you please, sir," interrupted Eve hastily, with a slight motion of her parasol that implied a check, "I presume our habits and opinions, notwithstanding you seem to think them so consonant to each other, are sufficiently different for you not to see the impropriety of one who is situated like yourself, abusing the confidence of a parent, by making such a proposal to a daughter without her father's knowledge, and on that point I shall say nothing. But as you have done me the honour of making a very unequivocal offer of your hand, I wish that the answer may be as distinct as the proposal. I decline the advantage and happiness of becoming your wife, sir."

"Time flies, Miss Eve!"

"Time does fly, Mr. Bragg; and if you remain much longer in the employment of Mr. Effingham, you may lose an opportunity of advancing your fortunes at the West, whither, I understand, it has long been your intention to emigrate."

"I will readily relinquish all my hopes at the West for your sake."

"No, sir; I cannot be a party to such a sacrifice. I will not say forget me, but forget your hopes here, and renew those you have so unreflectingly abandoned beyond the Mississippi. I shall not represent this conversation to Mr. Effingham in a manner to create any unnecessary prejudices against you; and while I thank you, as every woman should, for an offer that must infer some portion, at least, of your good opinion, you will permit me again to wish you all lawful success in your western enterprises."

Eve gave Mr. Bragg no farther opportunity to renew his suit, for she courtesied and left him as she ceased speaking. Mr. Dodge, who had been a distant observer of the interview, now hastened to join his friend, curious to know the result, for it had been privately arranged between these modest youths, that each should try his fortune in turn with the heiress, did she not accept the first proposal, as, however, it was rather supposed she might. To the chagrin of Steadfast, and probably to the reader's surprise, Aristobulus informed his friend that Eve's manner and language had been full of encouragement.

"She thanked me for the offer, Mr. Dodge," he said, "and her wishes for my future prosperity at the West were warm and repeated. Eve Effingham is indeed a charming creature!"

"At the West! perhaps she means differently from what you imagine. I know her well; that girl is full of art."

"Art, sir!—she spoke as plainly as woman could speak; and I repeat that I feel considerably encouraged. It is something to have had so plain a conversation with Eve Effingham."

Mr. Dodge swallowed his discontent, and the whole party soon embarked to return to the village; the commodore and the general taking boat by themselves, in order to bring their discussions on human affairs in general to a dignified close.

That night Sir George Templemore asked an interview with Mr. Effingham, who was alone in his library.

"I sincerely hope this request is not the forerunner of a departure," said the latter kindly, as the young man entered, "in which case I shall regard you as one unmindful of the hopes he has raised. You stand pledged by implication, if not in words, to pass another month with us."

"So far from entertaining any intention so faithless, my dear sir, I am fearful that you may think I trespass too far on your hospitality."

He then communicated his wish to be allowed to make Grace Van Courtlandt his wife. Mr. Effingham heard him with a smile, that showed he was not altogether unprepared for such a demand, and his eye glistened as he squeezed the other's hand.

"Take her, with all my heart, Sir George," he said; "but remember you are transferring a tender plant into a strange soil. There are not many of your countrymen to whom I would confide such a trust, for I know the risk they run who make ill-assorted unions."

"Ill-assorted unions, Mr. Effingham!"

"Yours will not be one in the ordinary acceptation of the term, I know; for in years, birth, and fortune, you and my dear niece are as much on an equality as can be desired; but it is too often an ill-assorted union for an American woman to become an English wife. So much depends on the man, that with one in whom I have less confidence than I have in you, I might justly hesitate. I shall take a guardian's privilege, though Grace be now her own mistress, and give you one solemn piece of advice,—always respect the country of the woman you have thought worthy to bear your name."

"I hope always to respect everything that is hers; but why this particular caution?—Miss Van Courtlandt is almost English in heart."

"An affectionate wife will generally take her bias, in such matters, from her husband. Your country will be her country; your God her God. Still, Sir George Templemore, a woman of spirit and sentiment can never wholly forget the land of her birth. You love us not in England, and one who settles there will often have occasion to hear gibes and sneers on the land from which she came."

"Good God! Mr. Effingham, you do not think I shall take my wife into society where—"

"Bear with a proser's doubts, Templemore. You will do all that is well-intentioned and proper, I dare say, in the usual acceptation of the words; but I wish you to do more,—that which is wise. Grace has now a sincere reverence and respect for England, feelings that in many particulars are sustained by facts, and will be permanent; but in some respects observation, as is usually the case with the young and sanguine, will detect the mistakes into which she had been led by enthusiasm and the imagination. As she knows other countries better she will come to regard her own with more favourable and discriminating eyes; losing her sensitiveness on account of peculiarities she now esteems, and taking new views of things. At the risk of being thought selfish, I shall add, also, that if you wish to cure your wife of any home-sickness, the surest mode will be to bring her back to her native land."

"Nay, my dear sir," said Sir George, laughing, "this is very much like acknowledging its blemishes."

"I am aware it has that appearance, and yet the fact is otherwise. The cure is as certain with the Englishman as with the American, and with the German as with either. It depends on a general law, which causes us all to over-estimate bygone pleasures and distant scenes, and to undervalue those of the present moment. You know I have always maintained there is no real philosopher short of fifty, nor any taste worth possessing that is a dozen years old."

Here Mr. Effingham rang the bell, and desired Pierre to request Miss Van Courtlandt to join him in the library. Grace entered blushing and shy, but with a countenance beaming with inward peace. Her uncle regarded her for a moment intently, and a tear glistened in his eye again as he tenderly kissed her burning cheek.

"God bless you, love," he said, "'tis a fearful change for your sex, and yet you all enter into it radiant with hope, and noble in your confidence. Take her, Templemore," giving her hand to the baronet, "and deal kindly by her. You will not desert us entirely. I trust I shall see you both once more in the Wigwam before I die."

"Uncle, uncle!" burst from Grace, as drowned in tears she threw herself into Mr. Effingham's arms; "I am an ungrateful, inconsiderate girl, thus to abandon all my natural friends. I have acted wrongly—"

"Wrongly! dearest Miss Van Courtlandt."

"Selfishly, then, Sir George Templemore," the simple-minded girl ingenuously added, scarcely knowing how much her words implied; "perhaps this matter ought to be reconsidered."

"I am afraid little would be gained by that, my love," returned the smiling uncle, wiping his eyes at the same instant. "The second thoughts of ladies usually confirm the first in such matters. God bless you, Grace. Templemore, may Heaven have you too in its holy keeping. Remember what I have said, and to-morrow we will converse further on the subject. Does Eve know of this, my niece?"

The colour went and came rapidly in Grace's cheek, and she looked to the floor abashed.

"We ought, then, to send for her," resumed Mr. Effingham, again reaching towards the bell.

"Uncle!" and Grace hurriedly interposed in time to save the string from being pulled: "could I keep such an important secret from my dearest cousin!"

"I find that I am the last to know it, as is generally the case with old fellows, and I believe that I am even now de trop."

Mr. Effingham kissed Grace again affectionately, and although she endeavoured to detain him, he left the room.

"We must follow," said Grace, hastily wiping her eyes, and rubbing the traces of tears from her cheeks. Excuse me, Sir George Templemore; will you open—"

He did open, not the door, but his arms. Grace seemed like one that was rendered giddy by standing on a precipice; but when she felt the young baronet was at hand to receive her, instead of quitting the library that instant, the bell had announced the appearance of the supper-tray before she even remembered that she had so earnestly intended to do so.

CHAPTER XXI.

—“This day, let no man think He hath business at his house.”

King Henry VIII.

The warm weather, which was always a little behind that of the lower counties, had now set in among the mountains, and the season had advanced into the first week in July. “Independence Day,” as the 4th of that month is termed by the Americans, arrived, and the wits of Templeton were taxed as usual, in order that the festival might be celebrated with the customary intellectual and moral treat. The morning commenced with the parade of the two or three uniformed companies of the vicinity; much gingerbread and spruce-beer was consumed in the streets; no light potations of whiskey were swallowed in the groceries; and a great variety of liquors, some of which bore very ambitious names, shared the same fate in the taverns.

Mademoiselle Viefville had been told that this was the great American fête, the national festival; and she appeared that morning decked in gay ribands, and with her bright animated face covered with smiles for the occasion. To her surprise, however, no one seemed to respond to her feelings, and as the party rose from the breakfast-table, she took an opportunity to ask an explanation of Eve, in a little “aside.”

“Est-ce que je me suis trompée, ma chère? demanded the lively Frenchwoman; “is not this the celebration de votre Indépendance?”

“You are not mistaken, my dear Mademoiselle Viefville, and great preparations have been making to do it honour. I understand there is to be a military parade, an oration, a dinner, and fireworks.”

“Monsieur votre père?”

“Monsieur mon père is not much given to rejoicings, and he takes this annual joy much as a valetudinarian takes his morning draught.”

“Et Monsieur Jean Effingham?”

“Is always a philosopher; you are to expect no antics from him.”

“Mais ces jeunes gens! Monsieur Bragg, Monsieur Dodge; même, Monsieur Powis?”

“Se réjouissent en Américains. I presume your are aware that Mr. Powis has declared himself to be an American.”

Mademoiselle Viefville looked towards the streets, along which divers tall, sombre-looking countrymen, with faces more lugubrious than those of the mutes attending a funeral, were sauntering, with a desperate air of enjoyment, and she shrugged her shoulders as she muttered to herself, “Que ces Américains sont drôles!”

At a later hour, however, Eve surprised her father, and indeed most of the Americans of the party, by proposing that the ladies should walk out into the street, and witness the fête.

“My child, this is a strange proposition to come from a young lady of twenty!” said her father.

“Why strange, dear sir?—We always mingled in the village fêtes in Europe.”

“Certainement,” cried the delighted Mademoiselle Viefville; “c’est de rigueur même.”

“And it is de rigueur here, Mademoiselle Viefville, for young ladies to keep out of them,” observed John Effingham. “I should be very sorry to see either of you three ladies in the streets of Templeton to-day.”

“Why so, cousin Jack? Have we anything to fear from the rudeness of our countrymen? I have always understood, on the contrary, that in no other part of the world is woman so uniformly treated with respect and kindness as in this very Republic of ours; and yet, by all these ominous faces, I perceive that it will not do for her to trust herself in the streets of a village on a festa.”

“You are not altogether wrong in what you now say, Miss Effingham, nor are you wholly right. Woman, as a whole, is well treated in America; and yet it will not do for a lady to mingle in scenes like these, as ladies may and do mingle with them in Europe.”

“I have heard this difference accounted for,” said Paul Powis, “by the fact that women have no legal rank in this country. In those nations where the station of a lady is protected by legal ordinances, it is said she may descend with impunity; but, in this, where all are equal before the law, so many misunderstand the real merits of their position, that she is obliged to keep aloof from any collision with those who might be disposed to mistake their own claims.”

“I wish for no collision, no associating, Mr. Powis, but simply to pass through the streets with my cousin and Mademoiselle Viefville, to enjoy the sight of the rustic sports, as one would do in France or Italy, or even in republican Switzerland, if you insist on a republican example."

"Rustic sports!" repeated Aristobulus, with a frightened look; "the people will not bear to hear their sports called rustic, Miss Effingham."

"Surely, sir, the people of these mountains will hardly pretend that their sports are those of a capital!"

"I merely mean, ma'am, that the term would be monstrously unpopular; nor do I see why sports in a city"—Aristobulus was much too peculiar in his notions to call any place that had a mayor and alderman a town—"should not be as rustic as those in a village: the contrary supposition violates the principle of equality."

"And do you decide against us, dear sir?" Eve added, looking at Mr. Effingham.

"Without stopping to examine causes, my child, I shall say that I think you had better all remain at home."

"Voilà, Mademoiselle Viefville, une fête américaine!"

A shrug of the shoulder was the silent reply.

"Nay, my daughter, you are not entirely excluded from the festivities; all gallantry has not quite deserted the land."

"A young lady shall walk alone with a young gentleman, shall ride alone with him, shall drive out alone with him, shall not move without him dans le monde; mais she shall not walk in the crowd, to look at une fête, avec son père!" exclaimed Mademoiselle Viefville, in her imperfect English. "Je désespère, vraiment, to understand des habitudes américaines!"

"Well, Mademoiselle, that you may not think us altogether barbarians, you shall, at least, have the benefit of the oration—"

"You may well call it the oration, Ned, for I believe one, or certainly one skeleton, has served some thousand orators annually, any time these sixty years."

"Of this skeleton, then, the ladies shall have the benefit. The procession is about to be formed, I hear, and by getting ready immediately, we shall be just in time to obtain good seats."

Mademoiselle Viefville was delighted; for after trying the theatres, the churches, sundry balls, the opera, and all the admissible gaieties of New York, she had reluctantly come to the conclusion, that America was a very good country pour s'ennuyer, and for very little else; but here was the promise of a novelty. The three ladies completed their preparations accordingly, and, attended by all the gentlemen, they made their appearance in the assembly at the appointed hour.

The orator, who, as usual, was a lawyer, was already in possession of the pulpit, one of the village churches having been selected as the scene of the ceremonies. He was a young man who had recently been called to the bar, it being as much in rule for the legal tyro to take off the wire-edge of his wit in a Fourth of July oration, as it was formerly for a Mousquetaire to prove his spirit in a duel. That academy, which formerly was a servant of all work to the public, having been equally used for education, balls, preaching, and town-meetings, had shared the fate of most American edifices in wood,—lived its hour and been burned; and the collection of people, whom we have formerly had occasion to describe, appears to have also vanished from the earth, for nothing could be less alike in exterior at least than those who had assembled under the ministry of Mr. Grant, and their successors, who were now collected to listen to the wisdom of Mr. Writ. Such a thing as a coat of two generations was no longer to be seen; the latest fashion, or what was considered as such, being as rigidly respected by the young farmer, or the young mechanic, as by those more openly acknowledged leaders of the public taste, the law-student and the village shop-boy. All the red cloaks, too, had long since been laid aside to give place to imitation merino shawls, or, in cases of moderation and sobriety, to mantles of silk. As Eve cast a passing glance around her, she perceived Tuscan hats, bonnets of gay colours, and flowers, and dresses of French chintzes, where fifty years before would have been seen even men's woollen hats and homely English calicoes. It is true that the change among the men was not quite so striking, for their attire admits of less variety; but the black stock had superseded the check handkerchief and the bandana, gloves had taken the place of mittens, and the coarse and clownish shoe of "cow-hide" was supplanted by the calf-skin boot.

"Where are your peasants, your rustics, your milk and dairy maids—the people, in short," whispered Sir George Templemore to Mrs. Bloomfield, as they took their seats; "or is this occasion thought to be too intellectual for them, and this assembly composed only of the élite?"

"These are the people, and present a pretty fair specimen of their general appearance and deportment. Most of these men are what you in England would call operatives, and the women are their wives, daughters, and sisters."

The baronet said nothing at the moment, but he sat looking around him with a curious eye for some time, when he again addressed his companion.

"I see the truth of what you say, as regards the men, for a critical eye can discover the proofs of their occupations; but surely you must be mistaken so far as your own sex are concerned. There is too much delicacy of form and feature for the class you have mentioned."

"Nevertheless I have said nought but the truth."

"But look at their hands and feet, dear Mrs. Bloomfield. There are French gloves too, or I am mistaken!"

"I will not positively affirm that the French gloves actually belong to the dairy-maids,—though I have known even this prodigy; but, rely on it, you see here the proper female counterparts of the men, and singularly delicate and pretty females they are for persons of their class. This is what you call democratic coarseness and vulgarity, Miss Effingham tells me, in England."

Sir George smiled; but, as what it is the fashion of the country to call "the exercises" had just then began, he made no other answer.

These "exercises" commenced with instrumental music, certainly the weakest side of American civilisation. That which was heard on the present occasion had three essential faults, all of which are sufficiently general to be termed characteristic, in a national point of view. In the first place, the instruments themselves were bad; in the next place, they were assorted without any regard to harmony; and in the last place, their owners did not know how to use them. As in certain American cities—the word is well applied here—she is esteemed the greatest belle who can contrive to utter her nursery sentiments in the loudest voice, so in Templeton was he considered the ablest musician who could give the greatest éclat to a false note. In a word, clamour was the one thing needful; and, as regards time, that great regulator of all harmonies, Paul Powis, whispered to the captain, that the air they had just been listening to resembled what the sailors call a "round robin," or a particular mode of signing letters practised by seamen, in which the nicest observer could not tell which was the beginning or which the end.

It required all the Parisian breeding of Mademoiselle Vieffville to preserve her gravity during this overture, though she kept her bright, animated, French-looking eyes roaming over the assembly with an air of delight, that, as Mr. Bragg would say, made her very popular. No one else in the party from the Wigwam, Captain Truck excepted, dared look up, but each kept his or her eyes riveted on the floor, as if in silent enjoyment of the harmonies. As for the honest old seaman, there was as much melody in the howling of a gale to his unsophisticated ears as in anything else. He saw no great difference, therefore, between this feat of the Templeton band and the sighings of old Boreas; and, to say the truth, our nautical critic was not very much out of the way.

Of the oration it is scarcely necessary to say much; for if human nature is the same in all ages, and under all circumstances, so is a Fourth of July oration. There were the usual allusions to Greece and Rome, between the republics of which and that of this country there exists some such affinity as is to be found between a horse-chestnut and a chestnut-horse ; or that of mere words and a long catalogue of national glories, that might very well have sufficed for all the republics both of antiquity and of our own times. But when the orator came to speak of the American character, and particularly of the intelligence of the nation, he was most felicitous, and made the most rapid advances towards popularity. According to his account of the matter, no other people possessed a tithe of the knowledge, or a hundredth part of the honesty and virtue of the very community he was addressing ; and, after labouring for ten minutes to convince his hearers that they already knew everything, he wasted several more in trying to persuade them to undertake farther acquisitions of the same nature.

“How much better all this might be made,” said Paul Powis, as the party returned towards the Wigwam when the “exercises” were ended, “by substituting a little plain instruction on the real nature and obligations of the institutions for so much unmeaning rhapsody. Nothing has struck me with more surprise and pain than to find how few men, in a country where all depends on the institutions, have clear notions concerning their own condition.”

“Certainly this is not the opinion we usually entertain of ourselves,” observed Mrs. Bloomfield ; “and yet it ought to be. I am far from underrating the ordinary information of the country, which, taken at an average, is far superior to that of almost every other people ; nor am I one of those who, according to the popular European notions, fancy the Americans less gifted than others with intellect. But there can be but one truth in anything, and it falls to the lot of very few anywhere to master it. The Americans, moreover, are a people of facts and practices, paying but little attention to principles, and giving themselves the very minimum of time for investigations that lie beyond the reach of the common mind, and it follows that they know little of that which does not present itself in everyday transactions. As regards the practice of the institution, it is governed here, as elsewhere, by party, and party is never an honest or a disinterested expounder.”

“Are you, then, more than in the common dilemma,” asked Sir George, “or worse off than your neighbours?”

“We are worse off than our neighbours, for the simple reason that it is the intention of the American system, which has been deliberately framed, and which is, moreover, the result of a bargain, to carry out its theory in practice ; whereas, in countries where the institutions are the results of time and accidents, improve- ment is only obtained by innovations. Party invariably assails and weakens power. When power is in the possession of a few, the many gain by party; but when power is the legal right of the many, the few reap the benefit. Now, as party has no ally so strong as ignorance and prejudice, a right understanding of the principles of legislation is of far more importance in a popular government than in any other. In place of the eternal eulogies on facts that one hears on all public occasions in this country, I would substitute some plain and clear exposition of principles, or indeed I might say of facts as they are connected with principles."

"Mais la musique, Monsieur," interrupted Mademoiselle Vieffville, in a way so droll as to raise a general smile, "qu'en pensez-vous?"

"That it is music, my dear Mademoiselle, in neither fact nor principle."

"It only proves that a people can be free, Mademoiselle Vieffville," observed Mrs. Bloomfield, "and enjoy Fourth of July orations, without having very correct notions of harmony or of time."

"But do our rejoicings end here, Miss Effingham?"

"Not at all. There is still something in reserve for the day and 'all who honour it.' I am told the evening, which promises to be sufficiently sombre, is to terminate with a fête that is peculiar to Templeton, one which is called 'The Fun of Fire.'"

"It is an ominous name, and ought to be a brilliant ceremony."

As this was uttered the whole party entered the Wigwam.

The "fun of fire" took place, as a matter of course, at a later hour. When night had set in everybody appeared in the main street of the village; a part of which, from its width and form, was particularly well adapted to the sports of the evening. The females were mostly at the windows, or on such elevated stands as favoured their view; and the party from the Wigwam occupied a large balcony that crowned the piazza of one of the principal inns of the place.

The sports of the night commenced with rockets, of which a few—that did as much credit to the climate as to the state of the pyrotechnics of the village—were thrown up as soon as the darkness had become sufficiently dense to lend them brilliancy. Then followed wheels, crackers, and serpents, all of the most primitive kind, if indeed there be anything primitive in such amusements. A balloon or two succeeded. The "fun of fire" was to close the rejoicings, and they were certainly worth all the other sports of that day united, the gingerbread and spruce-beer included.

A blazing ball cast from a shop-door was the signal for the commencement of the "fun." It was merely a ball of common yarn, or of some other similar material, saturated with turpentine, and it burned with a bright, fierce flame until consumed. As the first of these fiery meteors sailed into the street a common shout from the boys, apprentices, and young men, proclaimed that the fun was commencing. It was followed by several more, and in a few minutes the entire area was one mass of brilliancy. The whole of the amusement consisted in tossing the fire-balls with boldness, and in avoiding them with dexterity, something like competition soon entering into the business of the scene.

The effect was singularly beautiful. Groups of dark objects became suddenly illuminated; and here a portion of the throng might be seen beneath a brightness like that produced by a bonfire, while the background was thronged by persons and faces, who were gliding about in a darkness that almost swallowed up the human figure. Suddenly all this would be changed, the brightness would pass away, and a ball alighting in a spot that had seemed abandoned to gloom, it would be found peopled with merry countenances and active forms. The constant transition from vivid brightness to deep gloom, with all the varying gleams of light and shadow, constituted the most beautiful feature of the scene, and excited the admiration of all in the balcony.

"Mais c'est charmant!" exclaimed Mademoiselle Vieville, who was enchanted at discovering something like gaiety and pleasure among the "tristes Américains," and who had never even suspected them of being capable of so much apparent enjoyment.

"These are the prettiest village sports I have ever witnessed," said Eve, "though a little dangerous one would think. There is something refreshing, as the magazine writers term it, to find one of these miniature towns of ours condescending to be gay and happy in a village fashion. If I were to bring my strongest objection to American country life, it would be its ambitious desire to ape the towns, converting the ease and abandon of a village into the formality and stiffness that render children in the clothes of grown people so absurdly ludicrous."

"What!" exclaimed John Effingham—"do you fancy it possible to reduce a freeman so low as to deprive him of his stilts? No, no, young lady; you are now in a country where, if you have two rows of flounces on your frock, your maid will make it a point to have three, by way of maintaining the equilibrium. This is the noble ambition of liberty."

"Annette's foible is a love of flounces, cousin Jack; and you have drawn that image from your eye instead of your imagination. It is a French as well as an American ambition, if ambition it be."

"Let it be drawn whence it may, it is true. Have you not remarked, Sir George Templemore, that the Americans will not even bear the ascendancy of a capital? Formerly Philadelphia, then the largest town in the country, was the political capital; but it was too much for any one community to enjoy the united consideration that belongs to extent and politics, and so the honest public went to work to make a capital that should have nothing else in its favour besides the naked fact that it was the seat of government; and I think it will be generally allowed that they have succeeded to admiration. I fancy Mr. Dodge will admit that it would be quite intolerable that country should not be town, and town country."

"This is a land of equal rights, Mr. John Effingham, and I confess that I see no claims that New York possess which do not equally belong to Templeton."

"Do you hold, sir," inquired Captain Truck, "that a ship is a brig, and a brig a ship?"

"The case is different; Templeton is a town, is it not, Mr. John Effingham?"

"A town, Mr. Dodge, but not town. The difference is essential."

"I do not see it, sir. Now New York, to my notion, is not a town, but a city."

"Ah! This is the critical acumen of the editor! But you should be indulgent, Mr. Dodge, to us laymen, who pick up our phrases by merely wandering about the world, or in the nursery, perhaps; while you, of the favoured few, by living in the condensation of a province, obtain a precision and accuracy to which we can lay no claim."

The darkness prevented the editor of the "Active Inquirer" from detecting the general smile, and he remained in happy ignorance of the feeling that produced it. To say the truth, not the smallest of the besetting vices of Mr. Dodge had their foundation in a provincial education, and in provincial notions; the invariable tendency of both being to persuade their subject that he is always right, while all opposed to him in opinion are wrong. That well-known line of Pope, in which the poet asks, contains the principle of half our foibles and faults, and perhaps explains fully that proportion of Mr. Dodge's, to say nothing of those of no small number of his countrymen. There are limits to the knowledge, and tastes, and habits of every man. As each is regulated by the opportunities of the individual, it follows of necessity that no one can have a standard much above his own experience. That an isolated and remote people should be a provincial people, or, in other words, a people of narrow and peculiar practices and opinions, is as unavoidable as that study should make a scholar; though, in the case of America, the great reason for astonishment is to be found in the fact that causes so very obvious should produce so little effect. When compared with the bulk of other nations, the Americans, though so remote and insulated, are scarcely provincial; for it is only when the highest standard of this nation is compared with the highest standard of others, that we detect the great deficiency that actually exists. That a moral foundation so broad should uphold a moral superstructure so narrow, is owing to the circumstance that the popular sentiment has domination; and, as everything is referred to a body of judges who, in the nature of things, must be of very limited and superficial attainments, it cannot be a matter of wonder to the reflecting that the decision should participate in the qualities of the tribunal. In America the great mistake has been made of supposing, that, because the mass rules in a political sense, it has a right to be listened to, and obeyed in all other matters,—a practical deduction that can only lead, under the most favourable exercise of power, to a very humble mediocrity. It is to be hoped that time, and a greater concentration of taste, liberality, and knowledge, than can well distinguish a young and scattered population, will repair this evil; and that our children will reap the harvest of the broad fields of intelligence that have been sowed by ourselves. In the mean time, the present generation must endure that which cannot easily be cured; and, among other of its evil consequences, it will have to submit to a great deal of very questionable information, not a few false principles, and to an unpleasant degree of intolerable and narrow bigotry, propagated by such apostles of liberty and learning as Steadfast Dodge, Esq.

"What can we reason but from what we know?"

We have written in vain if it now be necessary to point out a multitude of things in which that professed instructor and Mentor of the public, the editor of the "Active Inquirer," had made a false estimate of himself, as well as of his fellow-creatures. That such a man should be ignorant is to be expected, as he never had been instructed; that he was self-sufficient was owing to his ignorance, which oftener induces vanity than anything else; that he was intolerant and bigoted follows as a legitimate effect of his provincial and contracted habits; that he was a hypocrite came from his homage of the people; and that one thus constituted should be permitted periodically to pour out his vapidty, folly, malice, envy, and ignorance on his fellow-creatures, in the co-lums of a newspaper, was owing to a state of society in which the truth of the wholesome adage, "that what is every man's business is nobody's business," is exemplified not only daily, but hourly, in a hundred other interests of equal magnitude, as well as to a capital mistake, that leads the community to fancy that whatever is done in their name is done for their good.

As the "fun of fire" had by this time exhibited most of its beauties, the party belonging to the Wigwam left the balcony, and, the evening proving mild, they walked into the grounds of the building, where they naturally broke into groups, conversing on the incidents of the day, or such other matters as came uppermost. Occasionally gleams of light were thrown across them from a fire-ball; or a rocket's starry train was still seen drawn in the air, resembling the wake of a ship at night as it makes its way through the brine of the ocean.

CHAPTER XXII.

Gentle Octavia,
Let your best love draw to that point which seeks Best to preserve it. Antony and Cleopatra.

We shall not say it was an accident that brought Paul and Eve side by side, and a little separated from the others, for a secret sympathy had certainly exercised its influence over both, and probably contributed as much as anything else towards bringing about the circumstance. Although the Wigwam stood in the centre of the village, its grounds covered several acres, and were intersected with winding walks, and ornamented with shrubbery, in the well known English style, an improvement, also, of John Effingham's; for while the climate and forests of America offer so many inducements to encourage landscape gardening, it is a branch of art that, of all the other ornamental arts, is perhaps the least known in the country. It is true time had not yet brought the labours of the projector to perfection in this instance, but enough had been done to afford very extensive, varied, and pleasing walks. The grounds were broken, and John Effingham had turned the inequalities to good account, by planting and leading paths among them, to the great amusement of the lookers-on, however, who, like true disciples of the Manhattanese economy, had already begun to calculate the cost of what they termed grading the lawns, it being with them as much a matter of course to bring pleasure-grounds down to a mathematical surface as to bring a rail-road route down to the proper level.

Through these paths, and among the inequalities, groves, and shrubberies just mentioned, the party began to stroll, one group taking a direction eastward, another south, and a third westward, in a way soon to break them up into five or six different divisions. These several portions of the company, ere long, were moving in opposite directions, by taking the various paths; and, while they frequently met, they did not often reunite. As has been already intimated, Eve and Paul were alone, for the first time in their lives, under circumstances that admitted of an uninterrupted confidential conversation. Instead of immediately profiting, however, by this unusual occurrence, as many of our readers may anticipate, the young man continued the discourse in which the whole party had been engaged when they entered the gate that communicated with the street.

“I know not whether you felt the same embarrassment as myself to-day, Miss Effingham,” he said, “when the orator was dilating on the glories of the republic, and on the high honour which accompanies the American name. Certainly, though a pretty extensive traveller, I have never yet been able to discover that it is any signal advantage abroad to be one of the ‘fourteen millions of freemen.’”

“Are we to attribute the mystery that so long hung over your birth-place to this fact?” Eve asked, a little archly.

“If I have made any seeming mystery as to the place of my birth, it has been involuntarily on my part, Miss Effingham, so far as you, at least, have been concerned. I may not have thought myself authorized to introduce my own history into our little discussions, but I am not conscious of aiming at any unusual secrecy. At Vienna, and in Switzerland, we met as travellers; and now that you appear disposed to accuse me of concealment, I may retort, and say that neither you nor your father ever expressly stated in my presence that you were Americans.”

“Was that necessary, Mr. Powis?”

“Perhaps not; and I am wrong to draw a comparison between my own insignificance and the éclat that attended you and your movements.”

“Nay,” interrupted Eve hastily, “do not misconceive me. My father naturally felt an interest in you, after what had occurred on the lake of Lucerne; and I believe he was desirous of making you out to be a countryman, a pleasure that he has at length received.”

“To admit the truth, I was never quite certain, until within the last visit to England, on which side of the Atlantic I was actually born; and to this uncertainty may, perhaps, be attributed some of that cosmopolitism to which I made so many high pretensions on our late passage."

"Not know where you were born!" exclaimed Eve, with an involuntary haste of which she immediately repented.

"This no doubt sounds oddly to you, Miss Effingham, who have always been the pride and solace of a most affectionate father; but it has never been my good fortune to know either parent. My mother, who was the sister of Ducie's mother, died at my birth, and the loss of my father even preceded hers. I may be said to have been born an orphan."

Eve, for the first time in her life, had taken his arm as they pursued their walk, and the young man felt the gentle pressure of her little hand as she permitted this expression of sympathy to escape her at a moment which she found so intensely interesting to herself.

"It was indeed an irreparable misfortune, Mr. Powis. I fear you were put into the navy through the want of those who would have felt a natural concern in your welfare."

"The navy was my own choice; partly, I think, from a certain love of adventure, and quite as much, perhaps, with a wish to settle the question of my birth-place, practically at least, by enlisting in the service of the country that I first knew, and certainly loved best."

"But of that birth-place I understand there is now no doubt," said Eve, with more interest than she was herself conscious of betraying.

"None whatever. I am a native of Philadelphia: that point was conclusively settled in my late visit to my aunt, Lady Dunluce, who was present at my birth."

"Is Lady Dunluce also an American?"

"She is; never having quitted the country until after her marriage to Colonel Ducie. She was a younger sister of my mother, and, notwithstanding some jealousies and a little coldness that I trust have now disappeared, I am of opinion she loved her, though one can hardly answer for the durability of the family ties in a country where the institutions and habits are so artificial as in England."

"Do you think there is less family affection, then, in England than in America?"

"I will not say so much as that, though I am of opinion that neither country is remarkable for possessing the feeling in a very strong degree. In England, among the higher classes, it is impossible that the affections should not be weakened by so many adverse interests. When a brother knows that nothing stands between himself and rank and wealth but the claims of one who was born a twelvemonth earlier than himself, he feels more like a rival than a kinsman, and the temptation to envy or dislike, or even hatred, sometimes becomes stronger than the duty to love."

"And yet the English themselves say that the services rendered by the elder to the younger brother, and the gratitude of the younger to the elder, are so many ties in addition to those of blood."

"It would be contrary to all the known laws of feeling, and all experience, if this were so. The younger applies to the older for aid, in preference to a stranger, because he thinks he has a claim; and what man who fancies he has a claim is ever disposed to believe justice is fully done him? or who, that is required to discharge a duty, imagines he has not done more than could be properly asked?"

"I fear your opinion of man is none of the best, Mr. Powis."

"There may be exceptions, but such I believe to be the common feeling of humanity. The moment a duty is created, a disposition to think it may be easily discharged follows, and of all sentiments, that of a continued gratitude is the most oppressive. I fear more brothers are aided through family pride than through natural affection."

"What, then, loosens the tie among ourselves, where no law of primogeniture exists?"

"That which loosens everything — a love of change, that has grown up with the migratory habits of the people; and which, perhaps, is in some measure fostered by their institutions. Here is Mr. Bragg to confirm what I say, and I could wish we might hear his sentiments on this subject."

As Aristobulus, with whom walked Mr. Dodge, just at that moment came out of the shrubbery and took the same direction with themselves, Powis put the question, as one addresses and acquaintance in a room.

"Rotation in feelings, sir," returned Mr. Bragg, "is human nature, as rotation in office is natural justice. Some of our people are of opinion that it might be useful, could the whole of society be made periodically to change places, in order that every one might know how his neighbour lives."

"You are then an agrarian, Mr. Bragg?"

"As far from it as possible, nor do I believe you will find such an animal in all this country. Where property is concerned, we are a people that never let go as long as we can hold on, sir; but, beyond this, we like lively changes. Now, Miss Effingham, everybody thinks frequent changes in religious instructors, in particular, necessary. There can be no vital piety without keeping the flame alive with excitement."

"I confess, sir, that my own reasoning would lead to a directly contrary conclusion, and that there can be no vital piety, as you term it, with excitement."

Mr. Bragg looked at Mr. Dodge, and Mr. Dodge looked at Mr. Bragg; then each shrugged his shoulders, and the former continued the discourse.

"That may be the case in France, Miss Effingham," he said pointedly, and as he thought with dignity; "but in America we look to excitement as the great purifier. We might as soon expect the air in the bottom of a well to be healthy, as that the moral atmosphere should be clear and salutary without the breezes of excitement. For my part, Mr. Dodge, I think no man should be a judge, in the same court, for more than ten years at a time, and a priest becomes rather commonplace and flat after five. There are men that may hold out a little longer I acknowledge; but to keep real, vital, soul-saving regeneration stirring, a change should take place as often as once in five years in a parish; that is my opinion, at least."

"But, sir," rejoined Eve, "as the laws of religion are immutable, the modes by which it is known universal, and its promises, mediation, and obligations are every where the same, I do not see what you propose to gain by so many changes."

"Why, Miss Effingham, we change the dishes at table, and no family of my acquaintance more than this of your honourable father, and I am surprised to find you opposed to the system."

"Our religion, sir," answered Eve, gravely, "is a duty, and rests on revelation and obedience; while our diet may very innocently be a matter of mere taste, or even of caprice, if you will."

"Well, I confess I see no great difference; the great object in this life being to stir people up, and to go a-head. I presume you know, Miss Eve, that many people think we ought to change our own parson if we expect a blessing on the congregation."

"I should sooner expect a curse would follow an act of so much heartlessness, sir. Our clergyman has been with us since his entrance into the duties of his holy office; and it will be difficult to suppose that the Divine favour would follow the commission of so selfish and capricious an act, with a motive no better than the desire for novelty."

"You quite mistake the object, Miss Eve, which is to stir the people up; a hopeless thing, I fear, so long as they always sit under the same preaching."

"I have been taught to believe that piety is increased, Mr.

Bragg, by the aid of the Holy Spirit in sustaining and supporting all our good desires ; and I cannot persuade myself that the Deity finds it necessary to save a soul, through any of those human agencies by which men sack towns, turn an election, or incite a mob. I hear that extraordinary scenes are enacted in this country by some of the other sects ; but I trust never to see the day when the apostolic, reverend, and sober church in which I have been nurtured, shall attempt to advance the workings of that Divine power by a profane, human hurrah."

All this was Greek to Messrs. Dodge and Bragg, who were so accustomed "to stirring people up" in furthering their objects, that they had quite forgotten "that the more a man was in an excitement," the less he had to do with reason. The exaggerated religious sects who first peopled America, have had a strong influence in transmitting to their posterity false notions on such subjects ; for while the old world was accustomed to see Christianity used as an ally of government, and perverted from its one great end to be the instrument of ambition, cupidity, and selfishness, the new world has been fated to witness the re-action of such abuses, and to run into nearly as many errors in the opposite extreme. The two persons just mentioned had been educated in the school of provincial religious notions, that is so much favoured by a portion of this country, and they were striking examples of the truth of the adage, that "what is bred in the bone will be seen in the flesh," for their common character, common in this particular at least, was a strange mixture of the most narrow superstitions and prejudices, that existed under the garb of religious training, and unjustifiable frauds, meanness, and even vices. Mr. Bragg was a better man than Mr. Dodge, for he had more self-reliance and was more manly ; but on the score of religion he had the same contradictory excesses, and there was a common point, in the way of vulgar vice, towards which each tended, simply for the want of breeding and taste, as infallibly as the needle points to the pole. Cards were often introduced in Mr. Effingham's drawing-room, and there was one apartment expressly devoted to a billiard-table, and many was the secret fling and biting gibe that these pious devotees passed among themselves on the subject of so flagrant an instance of immorality in a family of such high moral pretensions, the two worthies not unfrequently concluding their comments by repairing to some secret room in a tavern, where, after carefully locking the door and drawing the curtains, they would order brandy, and pass a refreshing hour in endeavouring to relieve each other of the labour of carrying their odd sixpences by means of "little shoemaker's loo."

On the present occasion, however, the earnestness of Eve produced a pacifying effect on their consciences; for, as our heroine never raised her sweet voice above the tones of a gentlewoman, its very mildness and softness gave force to her expressions. Had John Effingham uttered the sentiments they had just listened to, it is probable Mr. Bragg would have attempted an answer; but, under the circumstances, he preferred making his bow, and diverging into the first path that offered, followed by his companion. Eve and Paul continued their circuit of the grounds as if no interruption had taken place.

“This disposition to change is getting to be universal in the country,” remarked the latter, as soon as Aristobulus and his friend had left them, “and I consider it one of the worst signs of the times; more especially since it has become so common to connect it with what it is the fashion to call excitement.”

“To return to the subject which these gentlemen interrupted,” said Eve, “that of family ties. I have always heard England quoted as one of the strongest instances of a nation in which this tie is slight, beyond its aristocratical influence, and I should be sorry to suppose that we are following in the footsteps of our great mother, in this respect, at least.”

“Has Mademoiselle Viefville never made any remark on this subject?”

“Mademoiselle Viefville, though observant, is discreet. That she believes the standard of the affections as high in this as in her own country, I do not think; for, like most Europeans, she believes the Americans to be a passionless people, who are more bound up in the acquisition of gain than in any other of the concerns of life.”

“She does not know us!” said Paul, so earnestly as to make Eve start at the deep energy with which he spoke. “The passions lie as deep, and run in as strong currents here, as in any other part of the world, though, there not being so many factitious causes to dam them, they less frequently break through the bounds of propriety.”

For near a minute the two paced the walk in silence, and Eve began to wish that some one of the party might again join them, in order that a conversation, which she felt was getting to be awkward, might be interrupted. But no one crossed their path again, and, without rudeness or affectation, she saw no means of effecting her object. Paul was too much occupied with his own feelings to observe his companion's embarrassment, and after the short pause mentioned, he naturally pursued the subject, though in a less emphatic manner than before.

“It was an old and a favourite theory with the Europeans,” he said, with a sort of bitter irony, “that all the animals of this hemisphere have less gifted natures than those of the other, nor is it a theory of which they are yet entirely rid. The Indian was supposed to be passionless, because he had self-command, and what in the European would be thought to exhibit the feelings of a noble nature, in him has been represented as ferocity and revenge. Miss Effingham, you and I have seen Europe, have stood in the presence of its wisest, its noblest, and its best; and of what have they to boast, beyond the immediate results of their factitious and laboured political systems, that is denied to the American,—or rather would be denied to the American, had the latter the manliness and mental independence to be equal to his fortunes?"

"Which, I fear, you think he is not."

"How can a people be even independent, that imports its thoughts, as it does its wares,—that has not the spirit to invent even its own prejudices?"

"Something should be allowed for habit and the influence of time. England herself probably has inherited some of her false notions from the Saxons and Normans."

"That is not only possible, but probable; but England, in thinking of Russia, France, Turkey, or Egypt, when induced to think wrong, yields to an English, and not to an American interest. Her errors are at least requited in a degree, by serving her own ends, whereas ours are made too often to oppose our most obvious interests. We are never independent, unless when stimulated by some plain and pressing monied concern, and even then the feeling is of a very ordinary character. But here is one, apparently, who does not belong to our party."

Paul interrupted himself in consequence of their meeting a stranger in the walk, who moved with the indecision of one uncertain whether to advance or to recede. Rockets frequently fell in the grounds, and there had been one or two inroads of boys, which had been tolerated on account of the occasion; but this intruder was a man in the decline of life, of the condition of a warm tradesman seemingly, and clearly had no connection with sky-rockets, as his eyes were turned inquiringly on the persons who passed him from time to time, to none of whom he had spoken, however, until he now placed himself before Paul and Eve, in a way to denote a desire to speak.

"The young people are making a merry night of it," he said, keeping a hand in each coat-pocket, while he unceremoniously occupied the centre of the narrow walk, as if determined to compel a parley.

Although sufficiently acquainted with the unceremonious habits of the people of the country to feel no surprise at this intrusion, Paul was vexed at having his tête-à-tête with Eve so rudely broken, and he answered with more of the hauteur and distance of the quarter-deck than he might otherwise have done, by saying coldly,

“Perhaps, sir, it is your wish to see Mr. Effingham, or—” hesitating an instant, as he scanned the stranger’s appearance, “some of his people. The first will soon pass this spot, and you will find most of the latter on the lawn watching the rockets.”

The man regarded Paul for a moment, and then removed his hat respectfully.

“Please, sir, can you inform me if a gentleman called Captain Truck, one that sails the packets between New York and England, is staying at the Wigwam at present?”

Paul told him that the captain was walking with Mr. Effingham, and that they would be the next pair who approached. The stranger fell back, keeping his hat respectfully in his hand, and the two passed.

“That man has been an English servant, but he has been a little spoiled by the reaction of an excessive liberty, which has tempted him to do as he pleases. The ‘please, sir,’ and the attitude, can hardly be mistaken, while the nonchalance of his manner ‘à nous aborder,’ sufficiently betrays the second edition of his education.”

“I am curious to know what this person can want of our excellent Captain; it can scarcely be one of the Montauk’s crew!”

“I will answer for it, that the fellow has not enough seamanship about him to whip a rope,” said Paul, laughing; “for if there be two temporal pursuits that have less affinity than any two others, they are those of the pantry and the tar-bucket. I think it will be seen that this man has been an English servant, and he has probably been a passenger with his master, on board some ship commanded by our honest old friend.” Eve and Paul now turned, and they met Mr. Effingham and the captain just as the latter reached the spot where the stranger stood waiting their arrival. “This is Captain Truck, the gentleman for whom you inquired,” said Paul.

The stranger looked hard at the captain, and the captain looked hard at the stranger, for the obscurity rendered a pretty close scrutiny necessary, to enable either to distinguish features. The examination seemed to be mutually unsatisfactory, as each retired a little, like a man who had not found a face that he knew.

“There must be two Captain Trucks, then, in the trade,” said the stranger; “this is not the gentleman I used to know.”

“I think you are as right in the latter part of your remark, friend, as you are wrong in the first,” returned the captain.

“Know you I do not, and yet there are no more two Captain Trucks in the English trade than there are two Miss Effinghams, or two Mrs. Hawkers, in the universe. I am John Truck, and no other man of that name ever sailed a ship between New York and England in my day at least.”

“Did you ever command the Dawn, sir?”

“The Dawn! That I did; and the Regulus, and the Manhattan, and the Wilful Girl, and the Deborah Angelina, and the Sukey and Katy, which, my dear young lady, I may say was my first love. She was only a fore-and-after, carrying no standing topsail even, and we named her after two of the river girls, who were flyers in their way, at least I thought so then; though a man, by sailing a packet, comes to alter his notions about men and things, or, for that matter, about women and things too. I got into a category in that schooner, that I never expect to see equalled, for I was driven ashore to windward in her, which is gibberish to you, my dear young lady, but which Mr. Powis will very well understand, though he may not be able to explain it.”

“I certainly know what you mean,” said Paul, “though I confess I am in a category, as well as the schooner, so far as knowing how it happened.”

“The Sukey and Katy ran away with me, that’s the upshot of it. Since that time I have never consented to command a vessel that was called after two of our river young women, for I do believe that one of them is as much as a common mariner can manage. You see, Mr. Effingham, we were running along a weather shore, as close in as we could get, to be in the eddy, when a squall struck her a-beam, and she luffed plump on to the beach. No helping it! Helm hard up, peak down, head-sheets to windward, and main-sheet flying, but it was all too late; away she went dead ashore to windward. But for that accident, I think I might have married.”

“And what connection could you find between matrimony and this accident, captain, to prevent you?” demanded Eve.

“There was an admonition in it, my dear young lady, that I thought was not to be disregarded. I tried the Wilful Girl after that: she was thrown on her beam-ends with me, after which I renounced all female names, and took to the Egyptian.”

“The Egyptians!”

“Certainly,—Regulus, who was a great snake-killer, they tell me, in that part of the world. But I never saw my way quite clear as bachelor until I got the Dawn. Did you know that ship, friend?”

“I believe, sir, I made two passages in her while you commanded her.”

“Nothing more likely; we carried lots of your countrymen, though mostly forward of the gangways. I commanded the Dawn more than twenty years ago.”

“It is about that time since I crossed with you, sir : you may remember that we fell in with a wreck ten days after we sailed, and took off her crew and two passengers. Three or four of the latter had died with their sufferings, and several of the people.”

“All this seems but as yesterday. The wreck was a Charleston ship, that had started a butt.”

“Yes, sir—yes, sir—that is just it; she had started, but could not get in; that was just what they said at the time. I am David, sir—I should think you could not have forgotten David!”

The honest captain was very willing to gratify the other's harmless self-importance, though, to tell the truth, he retained no more personal knowledge of the David of the Dawn than he had of David King of the Jews.

“Oh! David,” he cried cordially; “are you David? Well, I did not expect to see you again in this world, though I never doubted where we shall both be hereafter. I hope you are very well, David. What sort of weather have you made of it since we parted? If I recollect aright, you worked your passage—never at sea before?”

“I beg your pardon, sir; I never was at sea before the first time, it is true, but I did not belong to the crew. I was a passenger.”

“I remember now; you were in the steerage,” returned the captain, who saw daylight ahead.

“Not at all, sir, but in the cabin.”

“Cabin!” echoed the captain, who perceived none of the requisities of a cabin passenger in the appearance of the other. Ah! I understand—in the pantry?”

“Exactly so, sir. You may remember my master—he had the left-hand state-room to himself, and I slept next to the scuttle butt. You recollect master, sir?”

“Out of doubt, and a very good fellow he was. I hope you live with him still?”

“Lord bless you, sir, he is dead!”

“Ah! I recollect hearing of it at the time. Well, David, I hope if ever you cross again we shall be shipmates once more. We were beginners then, but we have ships worth living in now. Good night!”

“Do you remember Dowe, sir, that we got from the wreck?” continued the other, unwilling to give up his gossip so soon. “He was a dark man, who had had the small-pox badly. I think, sir, you will recollect him, for he was a hard man in other particulars besides his countenance."

"Somewhat flinty in soul. I remember the man well; and so, David, good night. You will come and see me, if you are ever in town. Good night, David!"

David was now compelled to leave the place, for Captain Truck, who perceived that the whole party was getting together again in consequence of the halt, felt the propriety of dismissing his visiter, of whom, his master, and Dowe, he retained just as much recollection as one retains of a common stage-coach companion after twenty years. The appearance of Mr. Howel, who just at that moment approached them, aided the manœuvre, and in a few minutes the different groups were again in motion, though some slight changes had taken place in the distribution of the parties.

CHAPTER XXIII.

How silver sweet sound lovers' tongues by night,
Like softest music to attending ears!

Romeo and Juliet.

"A poor matter this of the fire-works," said Mr. Howel, who, with an old bachelor's want of tact, had joined Eve and Paul in their walk. "The English would laugh at them famously, I dare say. Have you heard Sir George allude to them at all, Miss Eve?"

"It would be great affectation for an Englishman to deride the fire-works of any dry climate," said Eve laughing; "and I dare say, if Sir George Templemore has been silent on the subject, it is because he is conscious he knows little about it."

"Well, that is odd! I should think England the very first country in the world for fire-works. I hear, Miss Eve, that on the whole the baronet is rather pleased with us, and I must say that he is getting to be very popular in Templeton."

"Nothing is easier than for an Englishman to become popular in America," observed Paul, "especially if his condition in life be above that of the vulgar. He has only to declare himself pleased with America; or, to be sincerely hated, to declare himself displeased."

"And in what does America differ from any other country in this respect?" asked Eve quickly.

"Not much, certainly: love induces love, and dislike, dislike. There is nothing new in all this; but the people of other countries, having more confidence in themselves, do not so sensitively inquire what others think of them. I believe this contains the whole difference."

"But Sir George does rather like us?" inquired Mr. Howel with interest.

"He likes some of us particularly well," returned Eve. "Do you not know cousin Grace is to become Mrs.—I beg her pardon—Lady Templemore, very shortly?"

"Good God!—Is that possible?—Lady Templemore!—Lady Grace Templemore!"

"Not Lady Grace Templemore, but Grace, Lady Templemore, and graceful Lady Templemore into the bargain."

"And this honour, my dear Miss Eve, they tell me you refused."

"They tell you wrong, then, sir," answered the young lady, a little startled with the suddenness and brusquerie of the remark, and yet prompt to do justice to all concerned. "Sir George Templemore never did me the honour to propose to me, or for me, and consequently he could not be refused."

"It is very extraordinary! I hear you were actually acquainted in Europe?"

"We were, Mr. Howel, actually acquainted in Europe; but I knew hundreds of persons in Europe who have never dreamed of asking me to marry them."

"This is very strange—quite unlooked for. To marry Miss Van Courtlandt? Is Mr. John Effingham in the grounds?"

Eve made no answer, but Paul hurriedly observed.

"You will find him in the next walk, I think, by returning a short distance, and taking the first path to the left."

Mr. Howel did as told, and he was soon out of sight.

"That is a most devout believer in English superiority, and one may say, by his strong desire to give you an English husband, Miss Effingham, in English merit."

"It is the weak spot in the character of a very honest man. They tell me such instances were much more frequent in the country thirty years since than they are to-day."

"I can easily believe it, for I think I remember some characters of the sort myself. I have heard those who are older than I am draw a distinction like this, between the state of feeling that prevailed forty years ago, and that which prevails to-day:—they say that formerly England absolutely and despotically thought for America in all but those cases in which the interests of the two nations conflicted; and I have even heard competent judges affirm that so powerful was the influence of habit, and so successful the schemes of the political managers of the mother country, that even many of those who fought for the independence of America actually doubted the propriety of their acts, as Luther is known to have had fits of despondency concerning the fitness of the reformation he was producing; while latterly the leaning towards England is less the result of a simple mental dependance, —though of that there still remains a disgraceful amount—but of calculation, and a desire, in a certain class, to defeat the dominion of the mass, and to establish that of a few in its stead.”

“It would, indeed, be a strange consummation of the history of this country, to find it becoming monarchical!”

“There are a few monarchists, no doubt, springing up in the country, though almost entirely in a class that only knows the world through the imagination, and by means of books; but the disposition in our time is to aristocracy, and not to monarchy. Most men who become rich discover that they are no happier for their possessions; perhaps every man who has not been trained and prepared to use his means properly, is in this category, as our friend, the captain, would call it; and then they begin to long for some other untried advantage. The example of the rest of the world is before our own wealthy, and faute d'imagination, they imitate because they cannot invent. Exclusive political power is also a great ally in the accumulation of money; and a portion have the sagacity to see it, though I suspect more pine for the vanities of the exclusive classes than for their substance. Your sex, Miss Effingham, as a whole, are not above this latter weakness, as I think you must have observed in your intercourse with those you met abroad.”

“I met with some instances of weakness in this way,” said Eve with reserve, and with the pride of a woman, “though not more, I think, than among the men; and seldom, in either case, among those whom we are accustomed to consider people of condition at home. The self-respect, and the habits of the latter, generally preserved them from betraying this feebleness of character, if indeed they possessed it.”

“The Americans abroad may be divided into two great classes; those who go for an improvement in the sciences or the arts, and those who go for mere amusement. As a whole, the former have struck me as being singularly respectable, equally removed from an apish servility and a swaggering pretension to superiority; while, I fear, a majority of the latter have a disagreeable direction towards the vanities.”

“I will not affirm the contrary,” said Eve; “for frivolity and pleasure are too closely associated in ordinary minds alone. The number of those who prize the elegances of life for their intrinsic value is everywhere small, I should think, and I question if Europe is much better off than ourselves in this respect."

"This may be true; and yet one can only regret, in a case where so much depends on example, that the tone of our people was not more assimilated to their facts. I do not know whether you were struck with the same peculiarities; but whenever I felt in the mood to hear high monarchical and aristocratical doctrines blindly promulgated, I used to go to the nearest American Legation!"

"I have heard this fact commented on," Eve answered, "and even by foreigners; and, I confess, it has always struck me as singular. Why should the public agent of a republic make a parade of his anti-republican sentiments?"

"That there are exceptions, I will allow; but, after the experience of many years, I honestly think that such is the rule. I might distrust my own opinion, or my own knowledge, but others, with opportunities equal to my own, have come to the same conclusion. I have just received a letter from Europe, complaining that an American Envoy Extraordinary,—who would as soon think of denouncing himself as to utter the same sentiments openly at home,—has given an opinion against the effects of one of the commonest and most popular features of the American state governments; and this, too, under circumstances that might naturally be thought to be productive of practical consequences to his hearers."

"Tant pis. To me this is inexplicable!"

"It has its solution, Miss Effingham, like any other problem. In ordinary times extraordinary men seldom become prominent, power passing into the hands of clever managers. Now the very vanity and petty desires that betray themselves in glittering uniforms, puerile affectations, and feeble imitations of other systems, probably induce more than half of those who fill the foreign missions to apply for them; and it is no more than we ought to expect, if the real disposition should betray itself when there is no longer any necessity for hypocrisy."

"But I should think this necessity for hypocrisy would never cease! Can it be possible that a people so much attached to their institutions as the great mass of the American nation is known to be, will tolerate such a base abandonment of all they cherish?"

"How are they to know anything about it? It is a startling fact that there is a man at this instant who has not a single claim to such a confidence, either in the way of mind, principle, manners, or attainment, filling a public trust abroad, who, on all occasions, except those which he thinks will come directly before the American people, not only proclaims himself opposed to the ruling principles of their government, but who, in a recent controversy with a foreign nation, actually took part against those principles, informing the opposing nation that the administration at home would not be supported by the legislature of the country."

"And why is not this publicly exposed?"

"Cui bono? That portion of the public press which has no direct interest in the matter would treat the affair with indifference, while another might be induced to mystify the truth. It is quite impossible for a man in a private station to make the truth available in any country in a matter of public interest; and those in public stations seldom or never attempt it, unless they see a direct party end to be obtained. This is the reason why we see so much infidelity to the principles of the institutions among the public agents abroad,—they very well know that no one will be able to expose them. In addition to this motive, there is so strong a desire, in that portion of the community which is considered the highest, to effect a radical change in these very institutions, that infidelity to them in their eyes would be a merit rather than an offence."

"Surely, surely, other nations are not treated in this cavalier manner."

"Certainly not. The foreign agent of a prince who should whisper a syllable against his master would be recalled with disgrace; but the servant of the people is differently situated, since there are so many to be persuaded of his guilt. I could always put up with all the attacks that the Europeans are so fond of making on the American system, except those which they quoted from the mouths of our own diplomatic agents."

"Why do not our travellers expose this?"

"Most of them see too little to know anything of it. They dine at a diplomatic table, see a star or two, fancy themselves obliged, and puff elegances that have no existence except in their own brain. Some think with the unfaithful, and see no harm in the infidelity. Others calculate the injury to themselves; and no small portion would fancy it a greater proof of patriotism to turn a sentence in favour of the comparative "energies" and "superior intelligence" of their own people, than to point out this, or any other disgraceful fact, did they even possess the opportunities to discover it. Though no one thinks more highly of these qualities in the Americans, considered in connection with practical things, than myself, no one probably gives them less credit for their ability to distinguish between appearances and reality in matters of principle."

"It is probable, were we nearer to the rest of the world, these abuses would not exist; for it is certain they are not so openly practised at home. I am glad, however, to find that, even while you felt some uncertainty concerning your own birth-place, you took so much interest in us as to identify yourself in feeling, at least, with the nation."

"There was one moment when I was really afraid that the truth would show I was actually born an Englishman."

"Afraid!" interrupted Eve; "that is a strong word to apply to so great and glorious a people!"

"We cannot always account for our prejudices, and perhaps this was one of mine; and, now that I know that to be an Englishman is not the greatest possible merit in your eyes, Miss Effingham, it is in no measure lessened."

"In my eyes, Mr. Powis! I do not remember to have expressed any partiality for or prejudices against the English. So far as I can speak of my own feelings, I regard the English the same as any other foreign people."

"In words you have not, certainly; but acts speak more loudly than words."

"You are disposed to be mysterious to-night. What act of mine has declared pro or con in this important affair?"

"You have, at least, done what I fear few of your countrywomen would have had the moral courage and self-denial to do, and especially those who are accustomed to living abroad,—refused to be the wife of an English baronet of a good estate and respectable family."

"Mr. Powis," said Eve gravely, "this is an injustice to Sir George Templemore that my sense of right will not permit to go uncontradicted, as well as an injustice to my sex and me. I have told Mr. Howel in your presence that that gentleman has never proposed for me, and, of course, cannot have been refused; nor can I suppose that any American gentlewoman can deem so paltry a thing as a baronetcy an inducement to forget her self-respect."

"I fully appreciate your generous modesty, Miss Effingham; but you cannot expect that I, to whom Templemore's admiration gave so much uneasiness, not to say pain, am to understand you, as Mr. Howel has probably done, too broadly. Although Sir George may not have positively proposed, his readiness to do so on the least encouragement was too obvious to be overlooked by any near observer."

Eve was ready to gasp for breath, so completely by surprise was she taken by the calm, earnest, and yet respectful manner in which Paul confessed his jealousy. There was a tremour in his voice, too, usually so clear and even, that touched her heart; for, when there exists a real sympathy between the sexes, feeling responds to feeling as echo answers sound. She felt the necessity of saying something, and yet they had walked some distance ere it was in her power to utter a syllable.

"I fear my presumption has offended you, Miss Effingham," said Paul, speaking more like a corrected child than like the lion-hearted young man he had proved himself to be.

There was deep homage in the emotion he betrayed; and Eve, although she could barely distinguish his features, was not slow in discovering this proof of the extent of her power over his feelings.

"Do not call it presumption," she said; "for one who has done so much for us all can surely claim some right to take an interest in those he has so well served. As for Sir George Templemore, you have probably mistaken the feeling created by our common adventures for one of more importance. He is warmly and sincerely attached to my cousin, Grace Van Courtlandt."

"That he is so now, I fully believe; but that a very different magnet first kept him from the Canadas, I am sure. We treated each other generously, Miss Effingham, and had no concealments during that long and anxious night, when all expected that the day would dawn on our captivity. Templemore is too manly and honest to deny his former desire to obtain you for a wife, and I think even he would admit that it depended entirely on yourself to be so or not."

"This is an act of self-humiliation that he is not called on to perform," Eve hurriedly replied. "Such allusions now are worse than useless, and they might pain my cousin were she to hear them."

"I am mistaken in my friend's character if he leave his betrothed in any doubt on this subject. Five minutes of perfect frankness now might obviate years of distrust hereafter."

"And would you, Mr. Powis, avow a former weakness of this sort to the woman you had finally selected for your wife?"

"I ought not to quote myself for authority for or against such a course, since I have never loved but one, and her with a passion too single and too ardent ever to admit of competition. Miss Effingham, there would be something worse than affectation,—it would be trifling with one who is sacred in my eyes, were I now to refrain from talking explicitly, although what I am about to say is rather forced from me by circumstances than voluntarily spoken, and is almost uttered without a definite object. Have I your permission to proceed?"

"You can scarcely need such a permission, as you are the master of your own secrets, Mr. Powis."

Paul, like all men agitated by strong passion, was inconsistent, and far from just; and Eve felt the truth of this, even while her mind was ingeniously framing excuses for his weaknesses. Still the impression that she was about to listen to a declaration, that possibly ought never to be made, weighed upon her, and caused her to speak with more coldness than she actually felt. As she continued silent, however, the young man saw that it had become indispensably necessary to be explicit.

"I shall not detain you, Miss Effingham,—nor perhaps vex you," he said, "with the history of those early impressions which have gradually grown upon me, until they have become interwoven with my very existence. We met, as you know, at Vienna, for the first time. An Austrian of rank, to whom I had become known through some fortunate circumstances, introduced me into the best society of that capital, in which I found you the admiration of all who knew you. My first feeling was that of exultation at seeing a young countrywoman—you were then almost a child, Miss Effingham—the greatest attraction of a capital celebrated for the beauty and grace of its women."

"Your national partialities have made you an unjust judge towards others, Mr. Powis," Eve interrupted him by saying, though the earnestness and passion with which the young man uttered his feelings were music to her ears. "What had a young, frightened, half-educated American girl to boast of, when put in competition with the finished women of Austria?"

"Her surpassing beauty, her unconscious superiority of attainment, her trembling simplicity and modesty, and her meek purity of mind. All these you possessed, not only in my eyes, but in those of others; for these are subjects on which I dwelt too fondly to be mistaken."

A rocket passed over and near them at the moment, and while both were too much occupied by the discourse to heed the interruption its transient light sufficed to permit Paul to see the flushed cheeks and tearful eyes of Eve, as the latter were turned on him in a grateful pleasure, that his ardent praises extorted from her, in despite of all her struggles for self-command.

"We will leave to others this comparison, Mr. Powis," said she, "and confine ourselves to less doubtful subjects."

"If I am then to speak only of that which is beyond all question, I shall speak chiefly of my long-cherished, devoted, unceasing attachment. I adored you at Vienna, Miss Effingham, though it was at a distance, as one might worship the sun; for while your excellent father admitted me to his society, and, I even think, honoured me with some portion of his esteem, I had little opportunity to ascertain the value of the jewel that was contained in so beautiful a casket; but when we met the following summer in Switzerland, I first began truly to love! Then I learned the justness of thought, the beautiful candour, the perfectly feminine delicacy of your mind; and although I will not say that these qualities were not enhanced in the eyes of so young a man by the extreme beauty of their possessor, I will say that, as weighed against each other, I could a thousand times prefer the former to the latter, unequalled as the latter almost is, even among your own beautiful sex."

"This is presenting flattery in its most seductive form, Powis—"

"Perhaps my incoherent and abrupt manner of explaining myself deserves a rebuke, though nothing can be further from my intention than to seem to flatter, or in any manner exaggerate. I intend merely to give a faithful history of the state of my feelings, and of the progress of my love."

Eve smiled faintly, but very sweetly, as Paul would have thought, had the obscurity permitted more than a dim view of her lovely countenance.

"Ought I to listen to such praises, Mr. Powis," she asked; "praises which only contribute to a self-esteem that is too great already?"

"No one but yourself would say this; but your question does indeed remind me of the indiscretion that I have fallen into, by losing that command of my feelings in which I have so long exulted. No man should make a woman the confidant of his attachment, until he is fully prepared to accompany the declaration with an offer of his hand, and such is not my condition."

Eve made no dramatic start, assumed no look of affected surprise or of wounded dignity, but she turned on her lover her serene eyes with an expression of concern so eloquent, and of a wonder so natural, that could he have seen it, it would probably have overcome every difficulty on the spot, and produced the usual offer, notwithstanding the difficulty that he seemed to think insurmountable. "And yet," he continued, "I have now said so much, involuntarily as it has been, that I feel it not only due to you, but in some measure to myself, to add, that the fondest wish of my heart, the end and aim of all my day dreams and of my most sober thoughts for the future, centre in the common wish to obtain you for a wife."

The eye of Eve fell, and the expression of her countenance changed, while a slight, but uncontrollable tremor, ran through her frame. After a short pause she summoned all her resolution, and in a voice, the firmness of which surprised even herself, she asked—

"Powis, to what does all this tend?"

"Well may you ask that question, Miss Effingham!—You have every right to put it, and the answer, at least, shall add no fur—ther cause of self-reproach. Give me, I entreat you, but a minute to collect my thoughts, and I will endeavour to acquit myself of a duty, in a manner more manly and coherent than I fear has been the case for the last ten minutes."

They walked a short distance in profound silence, Eve still under the influence of astonishment, in which an uncertain and indefinite dread of, she scarce knew what, began to mingle, while Paul was endeavouring to quiet the tumult that had been so suddenly aroused within him: the latter then spoke.

"Circumstances have always deprived me of the happiness of experiencing the tenderness and sympathy of your sex, Miss Effingham, and have thrown me more exclusively among the colder and ruder spirits of my own. My mother died at the time of my birth, thus cutting me off at once from one of the dearest of all earthly ties. I am not certain that I do not exaggerate the loss in consequence of the privations I have suffered; but, from the hour when I first learned to feel, I have had a yearning for the tender, patient, endearing, disinterested love of a mother. You too suffered a similar loss at an early period, if I have been correctly informed—"

A sob—a stifled, but painful sob—escaped Eve, and, inexpressibly shocked, Paul ceased to dwell on his own sources of sorrow, to attend to those he had so unintentionally disturbed.

"I have been selfish, dearest Miss Effingham," he exclaimed—"have overtaxed your patience—have annoyed you with griefs and losses that have no interest for you—can have no interest with one happy and blessed as yourself."

"No, no, no, Powis—you are unjust to both. I, too, lost my mother when I was a mere child, and never knew her love and tenderness. Proceed: I am calmer, and earnestly entreat you to forget my weakness, and to proceed."

Paul did proceed; but this brief interruption, in which they had mingled their sorrows for a common misfortune, struck a new chord of feeling, and at once removed a mountain of reserve and distance, that might otherwise have obstructed their growing confidence.

"Cut off in this manner from my nearest and dearest natural friend," Paul continued, "I was thrown an infant upon the care of hirelings, and, in this, at least, my fortune was still more cruel than your own; for the excellent woman who has been so happy as to have had the charge of your infancy, had nearly the love of a natural mother, however she may have been wanting in the attainments of one of your own condition in life."

"But we had both of us our fathers, Mr. Powis. To me, my excellent, high-principled, affectionate—nay, tender father has been everything. Without him, I should have been truly miserable; and with him, notwithstanding these rebellious tears—tears that I must ascribe to the infection of your own grief—I have been truly blest.”

“Mr. Effingham deserves this from you, but I never knew my father.”

“Not know your father!” exclaimed Eve, the tones of her voice betraying powerful sympathy with the privations of the orphan, rather than any vulgar or common-place surprise.

“He had parted from my mother before my birth, and either died soon after, or has never deemed his child of sufficient worth to make him the subject of interest enough to excite a single inquiry into his fate.”

“Then he never knew that child!” burst from Eve, with a fervour and frankness that set all reserve, whether of womanly training or of natural timidity, at defiance.

“Miss Effingham! dearest Miss Effingham—Eve, my own Eve, what am I to infer from this generous warmth? Do not mislead me! I can bear my solitary misery, can brave the sufferings of an isolated existence, but I could not live under the disappointment of such a hope, a hope fairly quickened by an expression from your lips!”

“You teach me the importance of caution, Powis, and we will now return to your history, and to that confidence of which I shall not prove a faithless repository. For the present, at least, I beg that you will forget all else.”

“A command so kindly, so encouragingly given,—do I offend, dearest Miss Effingham?”

Eve, for the first time in her life, placed her own light arm and beautiful hand through the arm of Paul, discovering a bewitching but modest reliance on his worth and truth in the very manner in which she did this simple and every-day act, while she said more cheerfully,—

“You forget the substance of the command, at the very moment you would have me suppose you the most disposed to obey it.”

“Well, then, Miss Effingham, you shall be more implicitly obeyed. Why my father left my mother so soon after their union, I never knew. It would seem that they lived together but a few months, though I have the proud consolation of knowing that my mother was blameless. For years I suffered the misery of doubt on a point that is ever the most tender with man—a distrust of his own mother; but all this has been happily, blessedly cleared up, during my late visit to England. It is true that Lady Dunluce was my mother’s sister, and as such might have been lenient to her failings; but a last letter from my father, that was written but a month before my mother's death, leaves no doubt, not only of her blamelessness as a wife, but also bears ample testimony to the sweetness of her disposition. This letter is a precious document for a son to possess, Miss Effingham!"

Eve made no answer, but Paul fancied that he felt a gentle pressure of the hand which, until then, had rested so lightly on his own arm, that he scarcely dared to move the latter, lest he might lose the precious, though trifling consciousness of its presence.

"I have other letters from my father to my mother," the young man continued, "but none that are so cheering to my heart as this. From their general tone I cannot persuade myself that he ever truly loved her. It is a cruel thing, Miss Effingham, for a man to deceive a woman on a point like this!"

"Cruel indeed!" said Eve firmly. "Death itself were preferable to such a delusion."

"I think my father deceived himself as well as my mother, for there is a strange incoherence and a want of distinctness in some of his letters, that feelings so keen as mine would naturally be on such a subject, led me to distrust his affection from the first."

"Was your mother rich?" Eve asked innocently, for, an heiress herself, her vigilance had early been directed to that great avenue of deception and dishonesty on this delicate subject.

"Not in the least. She had little besides her high lineage and her beauty. I have her picture, which sufficiently proves the latter—had, I ought rather to say, for it was her miniature of which I was robbed by the Arabs, as you may remember, and I have not seen it since. In the way of money, my mother had barely the competency of a gentlewoman; nothing more."

The pressure on Paul's arm was more palpable as he spoke of the miniature, and he ventured to touch his companion's arm, in order to give it a surer hold of his own.

"Mr. Powis was not mercenary then, and it is a great deal," said Eve, speaking as if she were scarcely conscious that she spoke at all.

"Mr. Powis! He was everything that was noble and disinterested. A more generous, or a less selfish man, never existed than Francis Powis!"

"I thought you never knew your father personally!" exclaimed Eve, in surprise.

"Nor did I. I now perceive your error in supposing that my father's name was Powis, when it was Assheton."

Paul then explained the manner in which he had been adopted, while still a child, by a gentleman called Powis, whose name he had taken, on finding himself deserted by his own natural parent, and to whose fortune he had succeeded on the death of his voluntary protector.

“I bore the name of Assheton until Mr. Powis took me to France, when he advised me to assume his own, which I did the more readily, as he thought he had ascertained that my father was dead, and that he had bequeathed the whole of a very considerable estate to his nephews and nieces, making no allusion to me in his will, and seemingly anxious even to deny his marriage. At least that person passed among his acquaintances for a bachelor to his dying day.”

“There is something so unusual and inexplicable in all this, Mr. Powis, that it strikes me you have been to blame, in not inquiring more closely into the circumstances, than, by your own account, I should think had been done.”

“For a long time, for many bitter years, I was afraid to inquire, lest I should learn something injurious to a mother’s name. Then there was the long and confined service of my profession, which kept me in distant seas, and the last journey and painful indisposition of my excellent benefactor, prevented even the wish to inquire after my own family. The offended pride of Mr. Powis, who was justly hurt at the cavalier manner in which my father’s family met his advances, aided in alienating me from that portion of my relations, and put a stop to all additional proffers of intercourse from me. They even affected to doubt the fact that my father had ever married.”

“But of that you had proof?” Eve earnestly asked.

“Unanswerable. My aunt Dunluce was present at the ceremony, and I possess the certificate given to my mother by the clergyman who officiated. Is it not strange, Miss Effingham, that with all these circumstances in favour of my legitimacy, even Lady Dunluce and her family, until lately, had doubts of the fact.”

“That is indeed unaccountable, your aunt having witnessed the ceremony.”

“Very true; but some circumstances, a little aided perhaps by the strong desire of her husband, General Ducie, to obtain the revival of a barony that was in abeyance, and of which she would be the only heir, assuming that my rights were invalid, had led her to believe that my father was already married when he entered into the solemn contract with my mother. But of that curse, too, I have been happily relieved!”

“Poor Powis!” said Eve, with a sympathy that her voice expressed more clearly even than her words; “you have indeed suffered much, for one so young!”

“I have learned to bear it, dearest Miss Effingham, and have stood so long a solitary and isolated being, one in whom none have taken any interest—”

“Nay, say not that — we at least have always felt an interest in you, have always esteemed you, and now have learned to—”

“Learned to?—”

“Love you!” said Eve, with a steadiness that afterwards astonished herself; but she felt that a being so placed was entitled to be treated with a frankness different from the reserve that it was usual for her sex to observe on similar occasions.

“Love!” cried Paul, dropping her arm, “Ah! Miss Effingham—Eve—but, that we? ”

“I mean my dear father—cousin Jack—myself—”

“Such a feeling will not heal a wound like mine! A love that is shared with even such men as your excellent father and your worthy cousin, will not make me happy. But why should I, unowned, bearing a name to which I have no legal title, and without relatives, aspire to one like you?”

The windings of the path had brought them near a window of the house, whence a stream of strong light gleamed upon the sweet countenance of Eve, as raising her eyes to those of her companion, with a face flushed with natural feeling and modesty, the struggle between which rendered her loveliness doubly winning, she smiled an encouragement that it was impossible to misconceive.

“Can I believe my senses? Will you—do you—can you listen to the suit of one like me?” the young man exclaimed, as he hurried his companion past the window, lest some interruption might destroy his hopes.

“Is there any sufficient reason why I should not, Powis?”

“Nothing but my unfortunate situation in respect to my family, my comparative poverty, and my general unworthiness.”

“Your unfortunate situation in respect to your relations would, if anything, be a new and dearer tie with us; your comparative poverty is merely comparative, and can be of no account when there is sufficient already; and as for your general unworthiness, I fear it will find more than an off-set in that of the girl you have so rashly chosen from the rest of the world.”

“Eve—dearest Eve—” said Paul, seizing both her hands, and stopping her at the entrance of some shrubbery that densely shaded the path, and where the little light that fell from the stars enabled him still to trace her features—“You will not leave me in doubt on a subject of this nature: am I really so blessed?”

“If accepting the faith and affection of a heart that is wholly yours, Powis, can make you happy, your sorrows will have an end.”

“But your father?” said the young man, almost breathless in his eagerness to know all.

“Is here to confirm what his daughter has just declared,” said Mr. Effingham, coming out of the shrubbery alone, and laying a hand kindly on Paul’s shoulder. “To find that at length you so well understand each other, Powis, removes from my mind one of the greatest anxieties I have ever experienced. My cousin John, as he was bound to do, has made me acquainted with all you have told him of your past life, and there remains nothing further to be revealed. We have known you for years, and receive you into our family with as free a welcome as we could receive any precious boon from Providence.”

“Mr. Effingham!—dear sir—” said Paul, almost gasping between surprise and rapture; “this is indeed beyond all my hopes,—and this generous frankness too in your lovely daughter—”

Paul’s hands had been transferred to those of the father, he knew not how; releasing them hurriedly, he now turned in quest of Eve again, but she had fled. In the short interval between the address of her father and the words of Paul she had found means to disappear, leaving the gentlemen together. The young man would have followed, but the cooler head of Mr. Effingham saw that the occasion, on all accounts, was favourable to a private conversation between himself and his accepted son-in-law, and unfavourable to one, or at least to a very rational one, between the lovers; he took the young man’s arm therefore, and led him towards a more private walk. Half an hour of confidential discourse calmed the feelings of both, and rendered Paul Powis one of the happiest of human beings.

CHAPTER XXIV.

You shall do marvellous wisely, good Reynaldo,
Before you visit him, to make inquiry

Anne Sidley was engaged among the dresses of Eve, as she loved to be, although Annette held her taste in too low estimation ever to permit her to apply a needle, or even to fit a robe to the beautiful form that was to wear it, when our heroine glided into the room and sunk upon a sofa. Eve was too much absorbed with her own feelings to observe the presence of her quiet, unobtrusive old nurse, and too much accustomed to her care and sympathy to heed it, had it been seen. For a moment she sat, her face suffused with blushes, her folded hands lying before her, her eyes fixed on the ceiling, and then the pent emotions found an outlet in a flood of tears. Poor Anne could not have felt more shocked had she heard of any unexpected calamity, than she was at this sudden out-breaking of feeling in her old charge. She went to her, and bent over her with the solicitude of a mother, as she inquired into the causes of her apparent sorrow.

"Tell me, Miss Eve, and it will relieve your mind," said the faithful woman. "Your dear mother had such feelings sometimes, and I never dared to question her about them; but you are my own child, and nothing can grieve you without grieving me."

The eyes of Eve were brilliant, her face continued to be suffused, and the smile which she gave through her tears was so bright as to leave her poor attendant in deep perplexity as to the cause of a display of feeling that was very unusual in a mind so well regulated as that of Eve.

"It is not grief, dear Nanny," Eve at length murmured; "anything but that! I am not unhappy. Oh! no; far, as far from unhappiness as possible!"

"God be praised it is so, ma'am! I was afraid that this affair of the English gentleman and Miss Grace might not prove agreeable to you, for he has not behaved as handsomely as he might in that transaction."

"And why not, my poor Nanny?—I have neither claim, nor the wish to possess a claim, to Sir George Templemore. His selection of my cousin has given me sincere satisfaction rather than pain. Were he a countryman of our own, I should say unalloyed satisfaction, for I firmly believe he will strive to make her happy."

Nanny now looked at her young mistress, then at the floor—at her young mistress again, and afterwards at a rocket that was sailing athwart the sky. Her eyes however returned to those of Eve, and encouraged by the bright look of happiness that was glowing in the countenance she so much loved, she ventured to say—

"If Mr. Powis were a more presuming gentleman than he is, ma'am—"

"You mean a less modest, Nanny," Eve said, perceiving that her nurse paused.

"Yes, ma'am—one that thought more of himself, and less of other people, is what I wish to say—"

"And were this the case?"

“I might think he would find the heart to say what I know he feels.”

“And did he find the heart to say what you know he feels, what would Anne Sidley say should be my answer?”

“Oh, ma’am, I know it would be just as it ought to be; I cannot repeat what ladies say on such occasions, but I know that it is what makes the hearts of the gentlemen leap for joy.”

There are occasions in which woman can hardly dispense with the sympathy of woman. Eve loved her father most tenderly, had more than usual confidence in him, for she had never known a mother; but had the present conversation been with him, notwithstanding all her reliance on his affection, her nature would have shrunk from pouring out her feelings so freely as she might have done with her other parent, had not death deprived her of such a blessing. Between our heroine and Anne Sidley, on the other hand, there existed a confidence of a nature so peculiar as to require a word of explanation before we exhibit its effects. As regards the care of her infancy, Anne had been a mother, or even more than a mother, to Eve; and this alone had induced great personal dependance in the one, and a sort of supervisory care in the other, that had brought her to fancy she was responsible for the bodily health and well-doing of her charge. But this was not all. Nanny had been the repository of Eve’s childish griefs, the confidant of her girlish secrets; and though the years of the latter soon caused her to be placed under the management of those who were better qualified to store her mind, this communication never ceased, the high-toned and educated young woman reverting with unabated affection, and a reliance that nothing could shake, to the long-tried tenderness of the being who had watched over her infancy. The effect of such an intimacy was often amusing; the one party bringing to the conferences a mind filled with the knowledge suited to her sex and station, habits that had been formed in the best circles of Christendom, and tastes that had been acquired in schools of high reputation, and the other little more than her single-hearted love, a fidelity that ennobled her nature, and a simplicity that betokened a perfect purity of thought. Nor was this extraordinary confidence without its advantages to Eve; for, thrown so early among the artificial and calculating, it served to keep her own ingenuousness of character active, and prevented that cold, selfish, and unattractive sophistication that mere women of fashion are apt to fall into, from their isolated and factitious mode of thinking. When Eve, therefore, put the questions to her nurse that have already been mentioned, it was more with a real wish to know how the latter would view a choice on which her own mind was so fully made up, than any silly trifling on a subject that engrossed so much of her best affections.

“But you have not told me, dear Nanny,” she continued, “what you would have that answer to be. Ought I, for instance, ever to quit my beloved father?”

“What necessity would there be for that, ma’am? Mr. Powis has no home of his own, and, for that matter, scarcely any country.”

“How can you know this, Nanny?” Eve demanded, with the jealous sensitiveness of fervent love.

“Why, Miss Eve, his man says this much, and he has lived with him long enough to know it, if he had a home. Now I seldom sleep without looking back at the day, and often and often have my thoughts turned to Sir George Templemore and Mr. Powis, and when I have remembered that the first had a house and a home, and that the last had neither, it has always seemed to me that he ought to be the one.”

“And then, in all this matter, you have thought of convenience, and what might be agreeable to others, rather than of me.”

“Miss Eve!”

“Nay, dearest Nanny, forgive me, I know your last thought, in everything, is for yourself. I admit that the mere circumstance of his having no home, ought not to be a sufficient reason for selecting any man for a husband. With most women it would be an objection.”

“I pretend to know very little of these feelings, Miss Eve; I have been wooed, I acknowledge, and once I do think I might have been tempted to marry, had it not been for one particular circumstance.”

“You — you marry, Anne Sidlèy!” exclaimed Eve, to whom the bare idea seemed as odd and unnatural as that her own father should forget her mother and take a second wife. “This is altogether new, and I should be glad to know what the lucky circumstance was, which prevented what to me might have proved a great calamity.”

“Why, ma’am, I said to myself, what does a woman do who marries? She vows to quit all else to go with her husband, and to love him before father and mother, and all other living beings on earth; is it not so, Miss Eve?”

“I believe it is so, indeed, Nanny—nay, I am quite certain it is so,” Eve answered, the colour deepening on her cheek, as she gave this opinion to her old nurse, with the inward consciousness that she had just experienced some of the happiest moments of her life, through the admission of a passion that overshadowed all the natural affections: “it is truly as you say.”

“Well, ma’am, I investigated my feelings, I believe they call it, and after a proper trial, I found that I loved you so much better than any one else, that I could not, in conscience, make the vows.”

“Dearest Nanny! my kind, good, faithful, darling old nurse! Let me hold you in my arms: and I, selfish, thoughtless, heartless girl, would forget the circumstances that would be most likely to keep us together for the remainder of our lives! Hist! there is a tap at the door. It is Mrs. Bloomfield; I know her light step. Admit her, my kind Anne, and leave us together.”

The bright searching eye of Mrs. Bloomfield was riveted on her young friend, as she advanced into the room; and her smile, usually so gay and sometimes so ironical, was now thoughtful and kind.

“Well, Miss Effingham,” she cried, in a manner that her looks contradicted, “am I to condole with you, or to congratulate? For a more sudden, or a more miraculous change, did I never before witness in a young lady, though whether it be for the better or the worse—these are ominous words, too,—for ‘better or worse,’ for ‘richer or poorer.’”

“You are in fine spirits this evening, my dear Mrs. Bloomfield, and appear to have entered into the gaieties of the ‘fun of fire’ with all your—”

“Might, will be a homely, but an expressive word. Your Templeton ‘fun of fire’ is fiery fun, for it has cost us something like a general conflagration. Mrs. Hawker has been near a downfall, like your great namesake, by a serpent coming too near her dress; one barn, I hear, has actually been in a blaze, and Sir George Templemore’s heart is in cinders. Mr. John Effingham has been telling me that he should not have been a bachelor had there been two Mrs. Bloomfields in the world, and Mr. Powis looks like a rafter dug out of Herculaneum—nothing but coal.”

“And what occasions this pleasantry?” asked Eve, with a manner so composed, that her friend was momentarily deceived.

Mrs. Bloomfield took a seat on the sofa by the side of our heroine, and regarding her steadily for near a minute, she continued.

“Hypocrisy and Eve Effingham can have little in common, and my ears must have deceived me.”

“Your ears, dear Mrs. Bloomfield!”

“My ears, dear Miss Eve Effingham. I very well know the odious character of an eavesdropper, but if gentlemen will make passionate declarations in the walks of a garden, with nothing but a little shrubbery between their ardent declamations and the curiosity of those who may happen to be passing, they must expect to be overheard."

Eve's colour had gradually increased as her friend proceeded, and when the other ceased speaking, as bright a bloom glowed on her sweet countenance, as had shown there when she first entered from the garden.

"May I ask the meaning of all this?" she said, with an effort to appear calm.

"Certainly, my dear, and you shall also know the feelings that prompt it, as well as the meaning," returned Mrs. Bloomfield, kindly taking Eve's hand, in a way to show that she did not mean to trifle further on a subject that was of so much moment to her young friend. "Mr. John Effingham and myself were passing at a point where two walks approach each other, just as you and Mr. Powis were passing in the adjoining path. Without absolutely stopping our ears, it was quite impossible not to hear a portion of your conversation. We both tried to behave honourably, for I coughed, and your kinsman actually hemmed, but we were unheeded!"

"Coughed and hemmed!" repeated Eve, in greater confusion than ever. "There must be some mistake dear Mrs. Bloomfield, as I remember to have heard no such signals."

"Quite likely, my love, for there was a time when I too, had ears for only one voice; but you can have affidavits to the fact, à la mode de New England, if you require them. Do not mistake my motive, nevertheless, Miss Effingham, which is anything but vulgar curiosity," here Mrs. Bloomfield looked so kind and winning that Eve took both her hands and pressed them to her heart. "You are motherless; without even a single female connexion, of a suitable age to consult with on such an occasion, and fathers, after all, are but men."

"Mine is as kind, and delicate, and tender as any woman can be, Mrs. Bloomfield."

"I believe it all, though he may not be quite as quick-sighted in an affair of this nature. Am I at liberty to speak to you, as if I were an elder sister?"

"Speak, Mrs. Bloomfield, as frankly as you please, but leave me the mistress of my answers."

"It is then as I suspected," said Mrs. Bloomfield, in a sort of musing manner; "the men have been won over, and this young creature has absolutely been left without a protector in the most important moment of her life!"

"Mrs. Bloomfield!—What does this mean?—What can it mean?"

"It means merely general principles, child: that your father and cousin have been parties concerned, instead of vigilant sentinels; and, with all their pretended care, that you have been left to grope your way in the darkness of female uncertainty, with one of the most pleasing young men in the country, constantly, before you, to help the obscurity."

It is a dreadful moment when we are first taught to doubt the worth of those we love, and Eve became pale as death as she listened to the words of her friend. Once before, on the occasion of Paul's return to England, she had felt a pang of that sort, though reflection, and a calm revision of all his acts and words since they first met in Germany, had enabled her to get the better of indecision; and when she first saw him on the mountain, nearly every unpleasant apprehension and distrust had been dissipated by an effort of pure reason. His own explanations had cleared up this unpleasant affair, and from that moment she had regarded him altogether with the eyes of a confiding partiality. The words of Mrs. Bloomfield now sounded like those of doom to her, and for an instant her friend was frightened with the effects of her own imperfect communication. Until that moment, Mrs. Bloomfield had formed no just idea of the extent to which the feelings of Eve were interested in Paul, for she had but an imperfect knowledge of their early association in Europe, and she sincerely repented having introduced the subject at all. It was too late to retreat, however, and first folding Eve in her arms, and kissing her cold forehead, she hastened to undo a part, at least, of the mischief she had done.

"My words have been too strong, I fear," she said; "but such is my general horror of the manner in which the young of our sex in this country are abandoned to the schemes of the designing and selfish of the other, that I am, perhaps, too sensitive when I see any one that I love thus exposed. You are known, my dear, to be one of the richest heiresses of the country, and I blush to say that no accounts of European society that we have, makes fortune-hunting a more regular occupation there than it has become here."

The paleness left Eve's face, and a look of slight displeasure succeeded.

"Mr. Powis is no fortune hunter, Mrs. Bloomfield," she said steadily: "his whole conduct for three years has been opposed to such a character; and then, though not absolutely rich, perhaps, he has a gentleman's income, and is removed from the necessity of being reduced to such an act of baseness."

"I perceive my error; but it is now too late to retreat. I dare not say that Mr. Powis is a fortune-hunter, but there are circumstances connected with his history that at least you ought to know, and that immediately. I have chosen to speak to you rather than to speak to your father, because I thought you might like a female confidant on such an occasion, in preference even to your excellent natural protector. The idea of Mrs. Hawker occurred to me on account of her age, but I did not feel authorized to communicate to her a secret of which I had myself become so accidentally possessed."

"I appreciate your motive fully, dearest Mrs. Bloomfield," said Eve, smiling with all her native sweetness, and greatly relieved, for she now began to think that too keen a sensitiveness on the subject of Paul had unnecessarily alarmed her,—“and beg there may be no reserve between us. If you know a reason why Mr. Powis should not be received as a suitor for my hand, I entreat you to mention it."

"Is he Mr. Powis at all?"

Again Eve smiled, to Mrs. Bloomfield's great surprise, for, as the latter had put the question with sincere reluctance, she was astonished at the coolness with which it was received.

"He is not Mr. Powis, legally perhaps, though he might be, but that he dislikes the publicity of an application to the legislature. His paternal name is Assheton," Eve answered, after a moment's hesitation.

"You know his history, then?"

"There has been no reserve on the part of Mr. Powis; least of all any deception."

Mrs. Bloomfield appeared perplexed, even distressed, and there was a brief space during which her mind was undecided as to the course she ought to take. That she had committed an error by attempting a consultation, in a matter of the heart, with one of her own sex, after the affections were engaged, she discovered when it was too late; but she prized Eve's friendship too much, and had too just a sense of what was due to herself, to leave the affair where it was, or without clearing up her own unmasked agency in it.

"I rejoice to learn this," she said, as soon as her doubts had ended; "for frankness, while it is one of the safest, is one of the most beautiful traits in human character; but, beautiful though it be, it is one that the other sex uses least towards our own."

"Is our own sex too ready to use it towards the other?"

"Perhaps not: it might be better for both parties were less deception practised during the period of courtship generally; but as this is hopeless, and might destroy some of the most pleasing illusions of life, we will not enter into a treatise on the frauds of Cupid. Now to my own confessions, which I make all the more willingly, because I know they are given to the ear of one who forgiving temperament, and who is disposed to view even my follies favourably."

The kind but painful smile of Eve assured the speaker she was not mistaken, and she continued, after taking time to read the expression of the countenance of her young friend,

"In common with all of New York, that town of babbling misses, who prattle as water flows, without consciousness or effect, and of whiskered masters, who fancy Broadway the world, and the flirtations of miniature drawing-rooms human nature, I believed, on your return from Europe, that an accepted suitor followed in your train in the person of Sir George Templemore."

"Nothing in my deportment, or in that of Sir George himself, or in that of any of my family, could justly have given rise to such a notion," said Eve quickly.

"Justly! What has justice, or truth, or even probability to do with a report of which love and matrimony are the themes? Do you not know society better than to fancy this improbability, child?"

"I know that our own sex would better consult their own dignity and respectability, my dear Mrs. Bloomfield, if they talked less of such matters, and that they would be more apt to acquire the habits of good taste, not to say of good principles, if they confined their strictures more to things and sentiments than they do, and meddled less with persons."

"And pray is there no tittle tattle, no scandal, no commenting on one's neighbours, in other civilized nations besides this?"

"Unquestionably, though I believe, as a rule, it is everywhere thought to be inherently vulgar, and a proof of a low association."

"In that we are perfectly of a mind, for, if there can be anything that betrays a consciousness of inferiority, it is our rendering others of so much obvious importance to ourselves as to make them the subjects of our constant conversation. We may speak of virtues, for therein we pay an homage to what is good; but when we come to dwell on personal faults, it is rather a proof that we have a silent conviction of the superiority of the subject of our comments to ourselves, either in character, talents, social position, or something else that is deemed essential, than of our distaste for his failings. Who, for instance, talks scandal of his grocer, or of his shoemaker, or his coachman? No, no; our pride forbids this: we always make our betters the subject of our strictures by preference, taking up with our equals only when we can get no one of a higher class."

"This quite reconciles me at having been given to Sir George Templemore by the world of New York," said Eve, smiling.

“And well it may, for they who have prattled of your engagement, have done so principally because they are incapable of maintaining a conversation on anything else. But all this time I fear I stand accused in your mind of having given advice unasked, and of feeling an alarm in an affair that affected others instead of myself, which is the very sin that we lay at the door of our worthy compeer. In common with all around me, then, I fancied Sir George Templemore an accepted lover, and, by habit, had associated you together in my thoughts. On my arrival here, however, I will confess that Mr. Powis, whom, you will remember, I had never seen before, struck me as the most dangerous man. Shall I own all my absurdity?”

“Even to the smallest shade.”

“Well, then, I confess to having supposed that, while the excellent father believed you were in a fair way to become Lady Templemore, the equally excellent daughter thought the other the most agreeable person.”

“What! in contempt of a betrothal?”

“Of course I ascribed that part of the report at once to the usual embellishments. We do not like to be deceived in our calculations, or to discover that even our gossip has misled us. In pure resentment at my own previous delusion, I began to criticise this Mr. Powis—”

“Criticise, Mrs. Bloomfield!”

“To find fault with him, my dear; to try to think he was not just the handsomest and most engaging young man I had ever seen; to imagine what he ought to be, in place of what he was, and, among other things, to inquire who he was.”

“You did not think proper to ask that question of any of us,” said Eve gravely.

“I did not, for I discovered by instinct, or intuition, or conjecture,—they mean pretty much the same thing, I believe,—that there was a mystery about him—something that even his Templeton friends did not quite understand, and a lucky thought occurred of making my inquiries of another person.”

“They were answered satisfactorily,” said Eve, looking up at her friend with all the artless confidence that marks her sex when the affections have acquired the mastery over reason.

“Così, così: Bloomfield has a brother who is in the navy, as you know, and I happened to remember that he had once spoken of an officer of the name of Powis, who had performed a clever thing in the West Indies, where they were employed together against the pirates. I wrote to him one of my usual letters, that are compounded of all things in nature and art, and took an occasion to allude to a certain Mr. Paul Powis, with a general remark that he had formerly served, together with a particular inquiry if he knew anything about him. All this no doubt you thought very officious ; but believe me, dear Eve, where there was as much interest as I felt and feel in you, it was very natural."

"So far from entertaining resentment, I feel grateful for your concern, especially as I know it was manifested cautiously, and without any unpleasant allusions to third persons."

"In that respect I believe I did pretty well. Tom Bloomfield—I beg his pardon, Captain Bloomfield, for so he calls himself at present—knows Mr. Powis well, or rather did know him, for they have not met for years, and he speaks of his personal qualities and professional merit highly, but takes occasion to remark that there was some mystery connected with his birth, as, before he joined the service, he understood he was called Assheton, and at a later day Powis, and this without any public law, or public avowal of a motive. Now, it struck me that Eve Effingham ought not to be permitted to form a connection with a man so unpleasantly situated without being apprized of the fact. I was waiting for a proper occasion to do this ungrateful office myself, when accident made me acquainted with what has passed this evening, and perceiving that there was no time to lose, I came hither, more led by interest in you, my dear, perhaps, than by discretion."

"I thank you sincerely for this kind concern in my welfare, dear Mrs. Bloomfield, and give you full credit for the motive. Will you permit me to inquire how much you know of that which passed this evening?"

"Simply that Mr. Powis is desperately in love, a declaration that I take it is always dangerous to the peace of mind of a young woman, when it comes from a very, very engaging young man."

"And my part of the dialogue?"—Eve blushed to the eyes as she asked this question, though she made a great effort to appear calm,—“my answer?”

"There was too much of woman in me, of true, genuine, loyal, native woman, Miss Effingham, to listen to that, had there been an opportunity. We were but a moment near enough to hear anything, though that moment sufficed to let us know the state of the feelings of the gentleman. I ask no confidence, my dear Eve; and now that I have made my explanations, lame though they be, I will kiss you, and repair to the drawing-room, where we shall both be soon missed. Forgive me if I have seemed impertinent in my interference, and continue to ascribe it to its true motive."

"Stop, Mrs. Bloomfield, I entreat, for a single moment; I wish to say a word before we part. As you have been accidentally made acquainted with Mr. Powis's sentiments towards me, it is no more than just that you should know the nature of mine towards him."

Eve paused involuntarily, for, though she had commenced her explanation with a firm intention to do justice to Paul, the bashfulness of her sex held her tongue tied at the very moment her desire to speak was the strongest. An effort conquered the weakness, and the warm-hearted, generous minded girl succeeded in commanding her voice.

"I cannot allow you to go away with the impression that there is a shade of any sort on the conduct of Mr. Powis," she said. "So far from desiring to profit by the accidents that have placed it in his power to render us essential service, he has never spoken of his attachment until this evening, and then only under circumstances in which feeling naturally, perhaps I might say uncontrollably, got the ascendancy."

"I believe it all, for I feel certain Eve Effingham would not bestow her heart heedlessly."

"Heart!—Mrs. Bloomfield!"

"Heart, my dear; and now I insist on the subject's being dropped, at least for the present. Your decision is probably not yet made; you are not yet an hour in possession of your suitor's secret, and prudence demands deliberation. I shall hope to see you in the drawing-room: until then, adieu!"

Mrs. Bloomfield signed for silence, and quitted the room with the same light tread as that with which she had entered it.

CHAPTER XXV.

To show virtue her own feature, scorn her own image, and the very age and body of the time his form and pressure.

SHAKESPEARE.

When Mrs. Bloomfield entered the drawing-room she found nearly the whole party assembled in it. The "fun of fire" had ceased, and the rockets no longer gleamed athwart the sky; but the blaze of artificial light within was more than a substitute for that which had so lately existed without.

Mr. Effingham and Paul were conversing by themselves in a window-seat, while John Effingham, Mrs. Hawker, and Mr. Howel were engaged in an animated discussion on a sofa; Mr. Wenham had also joined the party, and was occupied with Captain Ducie, though not so much so as to prevent occasional glances at the trio just mentioned. Sir George Templemore and Grace Van Court-landt were walking together in the great hall, and were visible through the open door as they passed and repassed.

"I am glad of your appearance among us, Mrs. Bloomfield," said John Effingham, "for certainly a more obstinate Anglo-mania never existed than that which my good friend Howel manifests this evening, and I have hopes that your eloquence may persuade him out of some of those notions on which my logic has fallen, like seed scattered by the way-side."

"I can have little hope of success where Mr. John Effingham has failed."

"I am far from being certain of that, for somehow Howel has taken up the notion that I have a grudge against England, and he listens to all I say with distrust and distaste."

"Mr. John uses strong language habitually, ma'am," cried Mr. Howel, "and you will make some allowances for a vocabulary that has no very mild terms in it; though, to be frank, I do confess that he seems prejudiced on the subject of that great nation."

"What is the point in immediate controversy, gentlemen?" asked Mrs. Bloomfield, taking a seat.

"Why, here is a review of a late American work, ma'am, and I insist that the author is 'skinned alive,' whereas Mr. John insists that the reviewer exposes only his own rage, the work having a national character, and running counter to the reviewer's feelings and interests."

"Nay, I protest against this statement of the case, for I affirm that the reviewer exposes a great deal more than his rage, since his imbecility, ignorance, and dishonesty are quite as apparent as anything else."

"I have read the article," said Mrs. Bloomfield, after glancing her eye at the periodical, and I must say that I take sides with Mr. John Effingham in his opinion of its character."

"But do you not perceive, ma'am, that this is the idol of the 'nobility and gentry'—the work that is more in favour with people of consequence in England than any other? Bishops are said to write for it!"

"I know it is a work expressly established to sustain one of the most factitious systems that ever existed, and that it sacrifices every high quality to attain its end."

"Mrs. Bloomfield, you amaze me! The first writers of Great Britain figure in its pages."

"That I much question, in the first place; but even if it were so, it would be but a shallow mystification. Although a man of character might write one article for a work of this nature, it does not follow that a man of no character does not write the next.

The principles of the communications of a periodical are as different as their talents."

"But the editor is a pledge for all.—The editor of this review is an eminent writer himself."

"An eminent writer may be a very great knave, in the first place, and one fact is worth a thousand conjectures in such a matter. But we do not know that there is any responsible editor to works of this nature at all, for there is no name given in the title-page, and nothing is more common than vague declarations of a want of this very responsibility. But if I can prove to you that this article cannot have been written by a man of common honesty, Mr. Howel, what will you then say to the responsibility of your editor?"

"In that case I shall be compelled to admit that he had no connection with it."

"Anything in preference to giving up the beloved idol!" said John Effingham, laughing; "why not add at once, or that he is as great a knave as the writer himself?"

"I am glad, however, that Tom Howel has fallen into such good hands," said Mrs. Bloomfield, "and I devoutly pray you may not spare him."

We have said that Mrs. Bloomfield had a rapid perception of things and principles, that amounted almost to intuition. She had read the article in question, and, as she glanced her eyes through its pages, had detected its fallacies and falsehoods in almost every sentence. Indeed, they had not been put together with ordinary skill, the writer having evidently presumed on the easiness of the class of readers who generally swallowed his round assertions, and were so clumsily done that any one who had not the faith to move mountains would have seen through most of them, without difficulty. But Mr. Howel belonged to another school, and he was so much accustomed to shut his eyes to the palpable mystifications mentioned by Mrs. Bloomfield, that a lie, which, advanced in most works, would have carried no weight with it, advanced in this particular periodical, with him became elevated to the dignity of truth.

Mrs. Bloomfield turned to an article on America in the periodical in question, and read from it several disparaging expressions concerning Mr. Howel's native country; one of which was "The American's first plaything is the rattlesnake's tail." "Now what do you think of this assertion in particular, Mr. Howel?" she asked, reading the words we have just quoted.

"Oh! that is said in mere pleasantry—it is only wit."

"Well then, what do you think of it as wit?"

“Well, well, it may not be of a very pure water, but the best of men are unequal at times, and more especially their wit.”

“Here,” continued Mrs. Bloomfield, pointing to another paragraph, “is a positive statement, or a positive mis-statement, which makes the cost of the ‘Civil department of the United States government,’ about six times more than it really is.”

“Our government is so extremely mean, that I ascribe that error to generosity.”

“Well,” continued the lady, smiling, “here the reviewer asserts that Congress passed a law limiting the size of certain ships, in order to please the democracy, and that the executive privately evaded this law, and built vessels of a much greater size; whereas the provisions of the law are just the contrary, as it expressly commands that the ships should not be less than seventy-four guns, a piece of information, by the way, that I obtained from Mr. Powis.”

“Ignorance, ma’am; a stranger cannot be supposed to know all the laws of a foreign country.”

“Then why make bold and false assertions about them, that are intended to discredit that country?—Here is another assertion:—‘Ten thousand of the men that fought at Waterloo would have marched through North America.’ Do you believe this, Mr. Howel?”

“But that is merely an opinion, Mrs. Bloomfield; any man may be wrong in his opinions.”

“Very true; but it is an opinion uttered in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and twenty-eight; and after the battles of Bunker’s Hill, Monmouth, Plattsburg, Saratoga, and New Orleans; and, moreover, after it had been proved that something very like ten thousand of the identical men who fought at Waterloo, could not march even ten miles through the country.”

“Well, well, all this shows that the reviewer is sometimes mistaken.”

“Your pardon, Mr. Howel; I think it shows, according to your own admissions, that his wit, or rather its wit, for there is no his about it—that its wit is of a very indifferent quality as witticisms even; that it is ignorant of what it pretends to know; and that its opinions are no better than its knowledge, all of which, when fairly established against one who, by his very pursuit, professes to know more than other people, is very much like making it appear contemptible.”

“This is going back eight or ten years,—let us look more particularly at the articles about which the discussion commenced.”

“Volontiers.”

Mrs. Bloomfield now sent to the library for the work reviewed, and opening the review she read some of its strictures, and then turning to the corresponding passages in the work itself, she pointed out the unfairness of the quotations, the omissions of the context, and, in several flagrant instances, witticisms of the reviewer that were purchased at the expense of the English language. She next showed several of those audacious assertions for which the particular periodical was so remarkable, leaving no doubt with any candid person that they were purchased at the expense of truth.

"But here is an instance that will scarce admit of cavilling or objection on your part, Mr. Howel," she continued, "do me the favour to read that passage in the review."

Mr. Howel complied, and when he had done, he looked expectingly at the lady.

"The effect of the reviewer's statement is to make it appear that the author has contradicted himself: is it not?"

"Certainly; nothing can be plainer."

"According to your favourite reviewer, who accuses him of it in terms. Now let us look at the fact. Here is the passage in the work itself. In the first place you will remark that this sentence, which contains the alleged contradiction, is mutilated, the part which is omitted giving a directly contrary meaning to it from that which it bears under the reviewer's scissors."

"It has some such appearance, I do confess."

"Here you perceive that the closing sentence of the same paragraph, and which refers directly to the point at issue, is displaced, made to appear as belonging to a separate paragraph, and as conveying a different meaning from what the author has actually expressed."

"Upon my word, I do not know but you are right."

"Well, Mr. Howel, we have had wit of no very pure water, ignorance as relates to facts, and mistakes as regards very positive assertions; in what category, as Captain Truck would say, do you place this?"

"It is literally swindling," said John Effingham, "and the man who did it is inherently a knave."

"I think both these facts quite beyond dispute," observed Mrs. Bloomfield, laying down Mr. Howel's favourite review with an air of cool contempt, "and I must say I did not think it necessary to prove the general character of the work at this late day to any American of ordinary intelligence, much less to a sensible man like Mr. Howel."

"But, ma'am, there may be much truth and justice in the rest of its remarks," returned the pertinacious Mr. Howel, "although it has fallen into these mistakes."

“Were you ever on a jury, Howel?” asked John Effingham, in his caustic manner.

“Often; and on grand juries too.”

“Well, did the judge never tell you, when a witness is detected in lying on one point, that his testimony is valueless on all others?”

“Very true; but this is a review, and not testimony.”

“The distinction is certainly a very good one” resumed Mrs. Bloomfield, laughing, “as nothing, in general, can be less like honest testimony than a review!”

“But I think, my dear ma’am, you will allow that all this is excessively biting and severe. — I can’t say I ever read anything sharper in my life.”

“They strike me, Mr. Howel, as being nothing but epithets, the cheapest and most contemptible of all abuse. Were two men in your presence to call each other such names, I think it would excite nothing but disgust in your mind. When the thought is clear and poignant, there is little need to have recourse to mere epithets; indeed, men never use the latter except when there is a deficiency of the first.”

“Well, well, my friends,” cried Mr. Howel, as he walked away towards Grace and Sir George, “this is a different thing from what I at first thought it, but still I think you undervalue the periodical in general.”

“I hope this little lesson will cool some of Mr. Howel’s faith in foreign morality,” observed Mrs. Bloomfield, as soon as the gentleman named was out of hearing; “a more credulous and devout worshipper of the idol I have never before met.”

“The school is diminishing, but it is still large. Men, like Tom Howel, who have thought in one direction all their lives, are not easily brought to change their notions, especially when the admiration which proceeds from distance—distance ‘that lends enchantment to the view,’ is at the bottom of their faith. Had this very article been written and printed round the corner of the street in which he lives, Howel would be the first to say that it was the production of a fellow without talents or principles, and was unworthy of a second thought.”

“I still think he will be a wiser, if not a better man, by the exposure of its frauds.”

“Not he. If you will excuse a homely and a coarse simile, he ‘will return like the dog to his vomit,’ or ‘the sow to its wallowing in the mire.’ I never knew one of that school thoroughly cured until he became himself the subject of attack, or, by a close personæ communication, was made to feel the superciliousness of European superiority. It is only a week since I had a discussion with him on the subject of the humanity and the relish for liberty in his beloved model, and when I cited the instance of the employment of the tomahawk in the wars between England and this country, he actually affirmed that the Indian savages killed no women and children but the wives and offspring of their enemies; and when I told him the English, like most other people, cared very little for any liberty but their own, he coolly affirmed that their own was the only liberty worth caring for."

"Oh yes!" said young Mr. Wenham, who had overheard the latter portion of the conversation; "Mr. Howel is so thoroughly English, that he actually denies that America is the most civilized country in the world, or that we speak our language better than any nation was ever before known to speak its own language."

"This is so manifest an act of treason," said Mrs. Bloomfield, endeavouring to look grave,—for Mr. Wenham was anything but accurate in the use of words himself, commonly pronouncing 'been,' 'ben;' 'does,' 'dooze;' 'nothing,' 'nawthing;' 'few,' 'foo,' etc., "that Mr. Howel should certainly be arraigned at the bar of public opinion for the outrage."

"It is commonly admitted, even by our enemies, that our mode of speaking is the very best in the world, which, I suppose, is the real reason why our literature has so rapidly reached the top of the ladder."

"And is that the fact?" asked Mrs. Bloomfield, with a curiosity that was not in the least feigned.

"I believe no one denies that. You will sustain me in this, I fancy, Mr. Dodge?"

The editor of the "Active Inquirer" had approached, and was just in time to catch the subject in discussion. Now the modes of speech of these two persons, while they had a great deal in common, had also a great deal that was not in common. Mr. Wenham was a native of New York, and his dialect was a mixture that is becoming sufficiently general, partaking equally of the Doric of New England, the Dutch cross, and the old English root; whereas Mr. Dodge spoke the pure, unalloyed Tuscan of his province, rigidly adhering to all its sounds and significations. Dissipation, he contended, meant "drunkenness;" "ugly," "vicious;" "clever," "good-natured;" and "humbly (homely)" "ugly." In addition to this finesse in significations, he had a variety of pronunciations that often put strangers at fault, and to which he adhered with a pertinacity that obtained some of its force from the fact that it exceeded his power to get rid of them. Notwithstanding all these little peculiarities—peculiarities as respects every one but those who dwelt in his own province,—Mr. Dodge had also taken up the notion of his superiority on the subject of language, and always treated the matter as one that was placed quite beyond dispute by its publicity and truth.

“The progress of American literature,” returned the editor, “is really astonishing ; in the four quarters of the world, I believe it is very generally admitted, now, that our pulpit and bar are at the very summit of those two professions. Then we have much the best poets of the age, while eleven of our novelists surpass any of all the other countries. The American Philosophical Society is, I believe, generally considered the most acute and learned body now extant, unless, indeed, the New York Historical Society may compete with it for that honour. Some persons give the palm to one, and some to the other, though I myself think it would be difficult to decide between them. Then to what a pass has the drama risen of late years ! Genius is getting to be quite a drug in America.”

“You have forgotten to speak of the press, in particular,” interposed the complacent Mr. Wenham. “I think we may more safely pride ourselves on the high character of the press than on anything else.”

“Why, to tell you the truth, sir,” answered Steadfast, taking the other by the arm, and leading him so slowly away, that a part of what followed was heard by the two amused listeners, “modesty is so infallibly the companion of merit, that we, who are engaged in that high pursuit, do not like to say anything in our own favour. You never detect a newspaper in the weakness of extolling itself ; but, between ourselves, I may say, after a close examination of the condition of the press in other countries, I have come to the conclusion, that, for talents, taste, candour, philosophy, genius, honesty, and truth, the press of the United States stands at the very—”

Here Mr. Dodge passed so far from the listeners, that the rest of the speech became inaudible, though, from the well-established modesty of the man and the editor, there can be little doubt of the manner in which he concluded the sentence.

“It is said in Europe,” observed John Effingham, his fine face expressing the cool sarcasm in which he was so apt to indulge, “that there are la vieille and la jeune France ; I think we have now had pretty fair specimens of old and young America ; the first distrusting everything native, even to a potato, and the second distrusting nothing, even to itself.”

“There appears to be a sort of pendulum uneasiness in mankind,” said Mrs. Bloomfield, “that keeps opinion always vibrating around the centre of truth ; for I think it the rarest thing in the world to find man or woman who has not a disposition, as soon as an error is abandoned, to fly off into its opposite extreme. From believing we had nothing worthy of a thought, there is a set springing up who appear to have jumped to the conclusion that we have everything."

"Ay, this is one of the reasons why all the rest of the world laugh at us."

"Laugh at us, Mr. Effingham! Even I had supposed the American name had, at least, got to be in good odour in other parts of the world."

"Then even you, my dear Mrs Bloomfield, are notably mistaken. Europe, it is true, is beginning to give us credit for not being quite as bad as she once thought us; but we are far, very far, from being yet admitted to the ordinary level of nations as respects goodness."

"Surely they give us credit for energy, enterprise, activity?"

"Qualities that they prettily term rapacity, cunning, and swindling! I am far, very far, however, from giving credit to all that it suits the interests and prejudices of Europe, especially of our venerable kinswoman, Old England, to circulate and think to the prejudice of this country, which, in my poor judgment, has as much substantial merit to boast of as any nation on earth; though, in getting rid of a set of ancient vices and follies, it has not had the sagacity to discover that it is fast falling into pretty tolerable, or, if you like it better, intolerable substitutes."

"What then do you deem our greatest error, our weakest point."

"Provincialisms, with their train of narrow prejudices, and a disposition to set up mediocrity as perfection, under the double influence of an ignorance that unavoidably arises from a want of models, and of the irresistible tendency to mediocrity, in a nation where the common mind so imperiously rules."

"But does not the common mind rule everywhere?—is not public opinion always stronger than law?"

"In a certain sense both these positions may be true. But in a nation like this, without a capital, one that is all provinces, in which intelligence and tastes are scattered, this common mind wants the usual direction, and derives its impulses from the force of numbers, rather than from the force of knowledge. Hence the fact that the public opinion never, or seldom, rises to absolute truth. I grant you that as a mediocrity it is well—much better than common, even; but it is still a mediocrity."

"I see the justice of your remarks, and I suppose we are to ascribe the general use of superlatives, which is so very obvious, to these causes."

"Unquestionably: men have gotten to be afraid to speak the truth when that truth is a little beyond the common comprehension, and thus it is that you see the fulsome flattery that all the public servants, as they call themselves, resort to, in order to increase their popularity, instead of telling the wholesome facts that are needed."

"And what is to be the result?"

"Heaven knows. While America is so much in advance of other nations in a freedom from prejudices of the old school, it is fast substituting a set of prejudices of its own, that are not without serious dangers. We may live through it, and the ills of society may correct themselves, though there is one fact that menaces more evil than anything I could have feared."

"You mean the political struggle between money and numbers that has so seriously manifested itself of late?" exclaimed the quick-minded and intelligent Mrs. Bloomfield.

"That has its dangers; but there is still another evil of greater magnitude. I allude to the very general disposition to confine political discussion to political men. Thus the private citizen who should presume to discuss a political question, would be deemed fair game for all who thought differently from himself. He would be injured in his pocket, reputation, domestic happiness, if possible; for in this respect America is much the most intolerant nation I have ever visited. In all other countries in which discussion is permitted at all, there is at least the appearance of fair play, whatever may be done covertly; but here it seems to be sufficient to justify falsehood, frauds, nay, barefaced rascality, to establish that the injured party has had the audacity to meddle with public questions, not being what the public chooses to call a public man. It is scarcely necessary to say that when such an opinion gets to be effective, it must entirely defeat the real intentions of a popular government."

"Now you mention it," said Mrs. Bloomfield, "I think I have witnessed instances of what you mean."

"Witnessed, dear Mrs. Bloomfield! Instances are to be seen as often as a man is found freeman enough to have an opinion independent of party. It is not for connecting himself with party that a man is denounced in this country, but for daring to connect himself with truth. Party will bear with party, but party will not bear with truth. It is in politics as in war; regiments or individuals may desert, and they will be received by their late enemies with open arms, the honour of a soldier seldom reaching to the pass of refusing succour of any sort; but both sides will turn and fire on the countrymen who wish merely to defend their houses and firesides."

"You draw disagreeable pictures of human nature, Mr. Effingham."

“Merely because they are true, Mrs. Bloomfield. Man is worse than the beasts, merely because he has a code of right and wrong, which he never respects. They talk of the variation of the compass, and even pretend to calculate its changes, though no one can explain the principle that causes the attraction or its vagaries at all. So it is with men: they pretend to look always at the right, though their eyes are constantly directed obliquely, and it is a certain calculation to allow of a pretty wide variation. But here comes Miss Effingham, singularly well attired, and more beautiful than I have ever before seen her.”

The two exchanged quick glances, and then, as if fearful of betraying to each other their thoughts, they moved towards our heroine, as if to do the honours of the reception.

CHAPTER XXVI.

Haply, when I shall wed,
That lord, whose hand must take my plight, shall carry
Half my love with him, half my care and duty.

Cordelia.

As no man could be more gracefully or delicately polite than John Effingham when the humour seized him, Mrs. Bloomfield was struck with the kind and gentlemanlike manner with which he met his young kinswoman on this trying occasion, and with the affectionate tones of his voice, and the winning expression of his eye, as he addressed her. Eve herself was not unobservant of these peculiarities, nor was she slow in comprehending the reason. She perceived at once that he was acquainted with the state of things between her and Paul. As she well knew the womanly fidelity of Mrs. Bloomfield, she rightly enough conjectured that the long observation of her cousin, coupled with the few words accidentally overheard that evening, had even made him better acquainted with the true condition of her feelings than was the case with the friend with whom she had so lately been conversing on the subject. Still Eve was not embarrassed by the conviction that her secret was betrayed to so many persons. Her attachment to Paul was not the impulse of girlish caprice, but the warm affection of a woman. It had grown with time, was sanctioned by her reason, and, if it was tinged with the more glowing imagination and ample faith of youth, it was also sustained by high principles and her sense of right. She knew that both her father and cousin esteemed the man of her own choice, nor did she believe the little cloud that hung over his birth could do more than leave a temporary influence on his own sensitive feelings. She met John Effingham, therefore, with a frank composure, returned the kind pressure of his hand with a smile such as a daughter might bestow on an affectionate parent, and turned to salute the remainder of the party with that lady-like ease which had become a part of her nature.

“There is one of the most attractive pictures that humanity can offer,” said John Effingham to Mrs. Bloomfield, as Eve walked away; “a young, timid, modest, sensitive girl, so strong in her principles, so conscious of rectitude, so pure in thought, and so warm in her affections, that she views her selection of a husband as others view their acts of duty and religious faith. With her, love has no shame, as it has no weakness.”

“Eve Effingham is as faultless as comports with womanhood; and yet I confess ignorance of my own sex if she receive Mr. Powis as calmly as she receives her father’s cousin.”

“Perhaps not, for in that case she could scarcely feel the passion. You perceive that he avoids oppressing her with his notice, and that the meeting passes off without embarrassment. I do believe there is an elevating principle in love that, by causing us to wish to be worthy of the object most prized, produces the desired effects by stimulating exertion. There now, are two as perfect beings as one ordinarily meets with, each oppressed by a sense of his or her unworthiness to be the choice of the other.”

“Does love, then, teach humility—successful love, too?”

“Does it not? It would be hardly fair to press this question on you, a married woman, for by the pandects of American society a man may philosophize on love, prattle about it, trifle on the subject, and even analyze the passion with a miss in her teens, and yet he may not allude to it in a discourse with a matron. Well, chacun à son goût; we are indeed a little peculiar in our usages, and have admitted a good deal of village coquetry and the flirtations of the May-pole to the drawing-room.”

“Is it not better that such follies should be confined to youth, than that they should invade the sanctity of married life, as I understand is too much the case elsewhere?”

“Perhaps so; though I confess it is easier to dispose of a straight-forward proposition from a mother, a father, or a commissioned friend, than to get rid of a young lady who, propria personâ, angles on her own account. While abroad, I had a dozen proposals——”

“Proposals!” exclaimed Mrs. Bloomfield, holding up both hands, and shaking her head incredulously.

“Proposals,—downright bonâ fide blushes-causing proposals! Why not, ma’am? Am I more than fifty? Am I not reasonably youthful for that period of life, and have I not six or eight thousand a year?”

“Eighteen, or you are much scandalized.”

“Well, eighteen, if you will,” coolly returned the other, in whose eyes money was no merit,—for he was born to fortune, and always treated it as a means, and not as the end of life,—“for every dollar is a magnet after one has turned forty. Do you suppose that a single man of tolerable person, well-born, and with a hundred thousand francs of rentes, could entirely escape proposals from the ladies in Europe?”

“This is so revolting to all our American notions, that, though I have often heard of such things, I have always found it difficult to believe them.”

“And is it more revolting for the friends of young ladies to look out for them, on such occasions, than that the young ladies should take the affair into their own hands, as is so often practised quite as openly here?”

“It is well you are a confirmed bachelor, or declarations like these would mar your fortunes. I will admit that the school is not so retiring and diffident as formerly, for we are all ready enough to say that no times are equal to our own times; but I shall strenuously protest against your interpretation of the nature and artlessness of an American girl.”

“Artlessness!” repeated John Effingham, with a slight lifting of the eyebrows. “We live in an age when new dictionaries and vocabularies are necessary to understand each other’s meaning. It is artlessness, with a vengeance, to beset an old fellow of fifty, as one would besiege a town. Hist! Ned is retiring with his daughter, my dear Mrs. Bloomfield, and it will not be long before I shall be summoned to a family council. Well, we will keep the secret until it is publicly proclaimed.”

John Effingham was right, for his two cousins left the room together, and retired to the library, but in a way to attract no particular attention, except in those who were enlightened on the subject of what had already passed that evening. When they were alone, Mr. Effingham turned the key, and then he gave a free vent to his paternal feelings.

Between Eve and her parent there had always existed a confidence exceeding that which it is common to find between father and daughter. In one sense, they had been all in all to each other, and Eve had never hesitated about pouring those feelings into his breast, which, had she possessed another parent, would now naturally have been confided to the affection of a mother.

When their eyes now first met, therefore, they were naturally beaming with an expression of confidence and love such as might, in a measure, have been expected between two of the gentler sex. Mr. Effingham folded his child to his heart, pressed her there tenderly for near a minute in silence, and then kissing her burning cheek, he permitted her to look up.

"This answers all my fondest hopes, Eve!" he exclaimed; "fulfils my most cherished wishes for thy sake!"

"Father!"

"Yes, my love, I have long secretly prayed that such might be your good fortune, for, of all the youths we have met, either at home or abroad, Paul Powis is the one to whom I can consign you with the greatest confidence that he will cherish and love you as you deserve to be cherished and loved."

"Dearest father, nothing but this was wanting to complete my perfect happiness!"

Mr. Effingham kissed his daughter again, and he was then enabled to pursue the conversation with greater composure. "Powis and I have had a full explanation," he said, "though, in order to obtain it, I have been obliged to give him strong encouragement."

"Sir!"

"Nay, my love, your delicacy and feelings have been sufficiently respected; but he has so much diffidence of himself, and permits the unpleasant circumstances connected with his birth to weigh so much on his mind, that I have been compelled to tell him, what I am sure you will approve, that we disregard family or connexions, and look only to the merit of the individual."

"I hope, father, nothing was said to give Mr. Powis reason to suppose we did not deem him every way our equal."

"Certainly not. He is a gentleman, and I can claim to be no more. There is but one thing in which connexions ought to influence American marriages, when the parties are suited to each other in the main requisites, and that is, to ascertain that neither should be carried into associations repugnant to their taste and habits. A woman, especially, ought never to be transplanted from a polished to an unpolished circle, for when this is the case, if she be really a lady, there will be a dangerous clog on her affection for her husband. This one great point assured, I see no other about which a parent need feel concern."

"Powis, unhappily, has no connexion in this country, or none with whom he has any communication; and those he has in England are of a class to do him credit."

"We have been conversing of this, and he has manifested so much proper feeling that it has even raised him in my esteem."

I know his father's family, and must have known his father I think, though there were two or three Asshetons of the name of John. It is a highly respectable family of the Middle States, and belonged formerly to the colonial aristocracy. Jack Effingham's mother was an Assheton."

"Of the same blood, do you think, sir? I remembered this, when Mr. Powis mentioned his father's name, and intended to question cousin Jack on the subject."

"Now you speak of it, Eve, there must be a relationship between them. Do you suppose that our kinsman is acquainted with the fact that Paul is, in truth, an Assheton?"

Eve told her father that she had never spoken with their relative on the subject at all.

"Then ring the bell, and we will ascertain at once how far my conjecture is true. You can have no false delicacy, my child, about letting your engagement be known to one as near and as dear to us as John."

"Engagement, father!"

"Yes, engagement," returned the smiling parent; "for such I already deem it. I have ventured, in your behalf, to plight your troth to Paul Powis, or what is almost equal to it, and, in return, I can give you back as many protestations of unequalled felicity, and eternal constancy, as any reasonable girl can ask."

Eve gazed at her father, in a way to show that reproach was mingled with fondness, for she felt that, in this instance, too much of the precipitation of the other sex had been manifested in her affairs. Still, superior to coquetry and affectation, and much too warm in her attachment to be seriously hurt, she kissed the hand she held, shook her head reproachfully, even while she smiled, and then did as had been desired.

"You have, indeed, rendered it important to us to know more of Mr. Powis, my beloved father," she said, as she returned to her seat, "though I could wish matters had not proceeded quite so fast."

"Nay, all I promised was conditional, and dependent on yourself. You have nothing to do, if I have said too much, but to refuse to ratify the treaty made by your negotiator."

"You propose an impossibility," said Eve, taking the hand again, that she had so lately relinquished, and pressing it warmly between her own; "the negotiator is too much revered, has too strong a right to command, and is too much confided in to be thus dishonoured. Father, I will, I do ratify, all you have, all you can promise in my behalf."

"Even if I annul the treaty, darling?"

"Even in that case, father. I will marry none without your consent, and have so absolute a confidence in your tender care of me, that I do not even hesitate to say, I will marry him to whom you contract me."

"Bless you, bless you, Eve! I do believe you, for such have I ever found you, since thought has had any control over your actions. Desire Mr. John Effingham to come hither;" then as the servant closed the door, he continued, "and such I believe you will continue to be until your dying day."

"Nay, reckless, careless father, you forget that you yourself have been instrumental in transferring my duty and obedience to another. What if this sea-monster should prove a tyrant, throw off the mask, and show himself in his real colours? Are you prepared, then, thoughtless, precipitate parent,"—Eve kissed Mr. Effingham's cheek with childish playfulness as she spoke, her heart swelling with happiness all the time,—"to preach obedience, where obedience would then be due?"

"Hush! precious; I hear the step of our cousin; he must not catch us fooling in this manner."

Eve rose, and when her kinsman entered the room, she held out her hand kindly to him, though it was with an averted face and a tearful eye.

"It is time I was summoned," said John Effingham, after he had drawn the blushing girl to him and kissed her forehead, "for what between tête-à-têtes with young fellows, and tête-à-têtes with old fellows, this evening, I began to think myself neglected. I hope I am still in time, however, to render a very decided disapprobation available?"

"Cousin Jack!" exclaimed Eve, with a look of reproachful mockery, "you are the last who ought to speak of disapprobation, for you have done little else but sing the praises of the applicant since you first met him."

"It is even so; then, like others, I must submit to the consequences of my own precipitation and false conclusions. Am I summoned to inquire how many thousands a year I shall add to the establishment of the new couple? As I hate business, say five at once, and when the papers are ready, I will sign them without reading."

"Most generous cynic," cried Eve, "I would I dared, now, to ask a single question!"

"Ask it without scruple, young lady, for this is the day of your independence and power. I am mistaken in the man, if Powis do not prove to be the captain of his own ship in the end."

"Well, then, in whose behalf is this liberality really meant; mine, or that of the gentleman?"

"Fairly enough put," said John Effingham, laughing, and again drawing Eve towards him, and saluting her cheek; "for if I were on the rack I could scarcely say which I love best; although you have the consolation of knowing, pert one, that you get the most kisses."

"I am almost in the same state of feeling myself, John, for son of my own could scarcely be dearer to me than Paul."

"I see, indeed, that I must marry," said Eve, hastily dashing the tears of delight from her eyes, for what could give more delight than to hear the praises of her beloved, "if I wish to retain my place in your affections. But, father, we forget the question we were to put to cousin Jack."

"True, love. John, your mother was an Assheton?"

"Assuredly, Ned; you are not to learn my pedigree, at this time of day, I trust?"

"We are anxious to make out a relationship between you and Paul; can it not be done?"

"I would give half my fortune, Eve consenting, were it so!—What reason is there for supposing it probable, or even possible?"

"You know that he bears the name of his patron and adopted parent, while that of his family is really Assheton."

"Assheton!" exclaimed the other, in a way to show that this was the first he had ever heard of the fact.

"Certainly; and as there is but one family of this name, which is a little peculiar in the spelling, for here it is spelt by Paul himself on this card, we have thought that he must be a relative of yours. I hope we are not to be disappointed in this expectation."

"Assheton!—It is, as you say, an unusual name, nor is there but one family that bears it in this country, to my knowledge. Can it be possible that Powis is truly an Assheton?"

"Out of all doubt," Eve eagerly exclaimed; "we have it from his own mouth. His father was an Assheton, and his mother was—"

"Who?" demanded John Effingham, with a vehemence that startled his companions.

"Nay, that is more than I can tell you, for he did not mention the family name of his mother; as she was a sister of Lady Dunluce, however, who is the wife of General Ducie, the father of our guest, it is probable her name was Dunluce."

"I remember no relation that has made such a marriage, or one who can have made such a marriage, and yet do I personally and intimately know every Assheton in the country."

Mr. Effingham and his daughter looked at each other, for it at once struck them all painfully that there must be Asshetons of another family.

"Were it not for the peculiar manner in which this name is spelled," said Mr. Effingham, "I could suppose there were Asshetons of whom we knew nothing; but it is difficult to believe that there can be such persons of a respectable family of whom we have never heard, for Powis said his relatives were of the Middle States—"

"And that his mother was called Dunluce?" demanded John Effingham earnestly, for he too appeared to wish to discover an affinity between himself and Paul.

"Nay, father, this I think he did not say, though it is quite probable, for the title of his aunt is an ancient barony, and those ancient baronies usually became the family name."

"In this you must be mistaken, Eve, since he mentioned that the right was derived through his mother's mother, who was an Englishwoman."

"Why not send for him at once, and put the question?" said the simple-minded Mr. Effingham; "next to having him for my own son, it would give me pleasure, John, to learn that he was lawfully entitled to that which I know you have done in his behalf."

"That is impossible," returned John Effingham. "I am an only child, and as for cousins through my mother, there are so many who stand in an equal degree of affinity to me, that no one in particular can be my heir-at-law. If there were, I am an Effingham, my estate came from Effinghams, and to an Effingham it should descend in despite of all the Asshetons in America."

"Paul Powis included!" exclaimed Eve, raising a finger reproachfully.

"True, to him I have left a legacy; but it was to a Powis, and not to an Assheton."

"And yet he declares himself legally an Assheton, and not a Powis."

"Say no more of this, Eve; it is unpleasant to me. I hate the name of Assheton, though it was my mother's, and could wish never to hear it again."

Eve and her father were mute, for their kinsman, usually so proud and self-restrained, spoke with suppressed emotion, and it was plain that, for some hidden cause, he felt even more than he expressed. The idea that there should be anything about Paul that could render him an object of dislike to one as dear to her as her cousin, was inexpressibly painful to the former, and she regretted that the subject had ever been introduced. Not so with her father. Simple, direct, and full of truth, Mr. Effingham rightly enough believed that mysteries in a family could lead to no good, and he repeated his proposal of sending for Paul, and having the matter cleared up at once.

"You are too reasonable, Jack," he concluded, "to let an antipathy against a name that was your mother's, interfere with your sense of right. I know that some unpleasant questions arose concerning your succession to my aunt's fortune; but that was all settled twenty years ago, in your favour too, and I had thought to your entire satisfaction."

"Unhappily, family quarrels are ever the most bitter, and usually they are the least reconcilable," returned John Effingham, evasively.—"I would this young man's name were anything but Assheton! I do not wish to see Eve plighting her faith at the altar to any one bearing that accursed name!"

"I shall plight my faith, if ever it be done, dear cousin John, to the man, and not to his name."

"No, no—he must keep the appellation of Powis, by which we have all learned to love him, and to which he has done so much credit."

"This is very strange, Jack, for a man who is usually so discreet and well-regulated as yourself. I again propose that we send for Paul, and ascertain precisely to what branch of this so-much-disliked family he really belongs."

"No, father; if you love me, not now!" cried Eve, arresting Mr. Effingham's hand as it touched the bell-cord. "It would appear distrustful, and even cruel, were we to enter into such an inquiry so soon. Powis might think we valued his family more than we value himself."

"Eve is right, Ned; but, I will not sleep without learning all. There is an unfinished examination of the papers left by poor Monday, and I will take an occasion to summon Paul to its completion, when an opportunity will offer to renew the subject of his own history, for it was at the other investigation that he first spoke frankly to me concerning himself."

"Do, cousin Jack, and let it be at once," said Eve earnestly. "I can trust you with Powis alone, for I know how much you respect and esteem him in your heart. See, it is already near ten."

"But he will naturally wish to spend the close of an evening like this, engaged in investigating something very different from Mr. Monday's tale," returned her cousin, the smile with which he spoke chasing away the look of chilled aversion that had so lately darkened his noble features.

"No, not to-night," answered the blushing Eve. "I have confessed weakness enough for one day. To-morrow, if you will—if he will, but not to-night. I shall retire with Mrs. Hawker, who already complains of fatigue, and you will send for Powis, to meet you in your own room, without unnecessary delay."

Eve kissed John Effingham coaxingly, and as they walked together out of the library, she pointed towards the door that led to the chambers. Her cousin laughingly complied, and when in his own room he sent a message to Paul to come to him.

"Now, indeed, may I call you a kinsman," said John Effingham, rising to receive the young man, towards whom he advanced, with extended hands, in his most winning manner: "Eve's frankness, and your own discernment, have made us a truly happy family."

"If anything could add to the felicity of being acceptable to Miss Effingham," returned Paul, struggling to command his feelings, "it is the manner in which her father and yourself have received my poor offers."

"Well, we will now speak of it no more: I saw from the first which way things were tending, and it was my plain dealing that opened the eyes of Templemore to the impossibility of his ever succeeding, by which means his heart has been kept from breaking."

"Oh! Mr. Effingham, Templemore never loved Eve Effingham. I once thought he cherished a passion for her, and he thought so too; but it could not have been a love like mine!"

"It certainly differed in the essential circumstance of reciprocity, which in itself singularly qualifies the passion, so far as duration is concerned. Templemore did not exactly know the reason why he preferred Eve, but, having seen so much of the society in which he lived, I was enabled to detect the cause. Accustomed to an elaborate sophistication, the singular union of refinement and nature caught his fancy, for the English seldom see the last separated from vulgarity, and when it is found, softened by a high intelligence and polished manners, it has usually great attractions for the blasés."

"He is fortunate in having so readily found a substitute for Eve Effingham."

"This change is not unnatural, neither. In the first place I, with this truth-telling tongue, destroyed all hope, before he committed himself by a declaration; and then Grace Van Courtlandt possesses the great attraction of nature, in a degree quite equal to that of her cousin. Besides, Templemore, though a gentleman, and a brave man, and a worthy one, is not remarkable for qualities of a very extraordinary kind. He will be as happy as is usual for an Englishman of his class to be, and he has no particular right to expect more. I sent for you, however, less to talk of love, than to trace its unhappy consequences in this affair revealed by the papers of poor Monday. It is time we acquitted ourselves of that trust. Do me the favour to open the dressing-case that stands on the toilet-table; you will find in it the key that belongs to the bureau, where I have placed the secretary that contains the papers."

Paul did as desired. The dressing-case was complicated and large, having several compartments, none of which were fastened. In the one first opened he saw a miniature of a female so beautiful, that his eye rested on it as it might be by fascination. Notwithstanding some difference made by the fashions of the different periods, the resemblance to the object of his love was obvious at a glance. Borne away by the pleasure of the discovery, and actually believing he saw a picture of Eve, drawn in a dress that did not in a great degree vary from the present attire, for fashion has undergone no very striking revolutions during the last twenty years, he exclaimed,—

"This is indeed a treasure, Mr. Effingham, and most sincerely do I envy you its possession. It is like, and yet, in some particulars, it is unlike,—it scarcely does Miss Effingham justice about the nose and forehead!"

John Effingham started when he saw the miniature in Paul's hand, but recovering himself, he smiled at the eager delusion of his young friend, and said with perfect composure,—

"It is not Eve, but her mother. The two features you have named in the former come from my family; but in all the others, the likeness is almost identical."

"This, then, is Mrs. Effingham!" murmured Paul, gazing on the face of the mother of his love with a respectful melancholy, and an interest that was rather heightened by a knowledge of the truth. "She died young, sir?"

"Quite; she can scarcely be said to have become an angel too soon, for she was always one."

This was said with an emotion that did not escape Paul, though it surprised him. There were six or seven miniature cases in the open compartment of the dressing-case, and supposing the one which lay uppermost belonged to the miniature in his hand, he raised it, and, with a sort of pious reverence, opened the lid intending to replace the picture of Eve's mother. Instead of finding an empty case, however, another miniature met his eye. The exclamation which now escaped the young man was one of delight and surprise.

"That must be my grandmother, with whom you are in such raptures at present," said John Effingham, laughing. "I was comparing it yesterday with the picture of Eve, which is in the Russia leather-case, that you will find somewhere there. I do not wonder, however, at your admiration, for she was a beauty in her day, and no woman is fool enough to be painted after she grows ugly."

"Not so, not so, Mr. Effingham! This is the miniature I lost in the Montauk, and which I had given up as booty to the Arabs. It has, doubtless, found its way into your state-room, and has been put among your effects by your man, through mistake. It is very precious to me, for it is nearly every memorial I possess of my own mother!"

"Your mother!" exclaimed John Effingham, rising involuntarily. "I think there must be some mistake, for I examined all those pictures this very morning, and it is the first time they have been opened since our arrival from Europe. It cannot be your missing picture."

"Mine it is certainly; in that I cannot be mistaken!"

"It would be odd, indeed, if one of my grandmothers, for both the pious ladies are there, should prove to be your mother! Powis, will you have the goodness to let me see the picture you mean."

Paul brought the miniature and a light, placing both before the eyes of his friend.

"That!" exclaimed John Effingham, his voice sounding harsh and unnatural to the listener—"that picture like your mother?"

"It is her miniature—the miniature that was transmitted to me from those who had charge of my childhood. I cannot be mistaken in the countenance or in the dress."

"And your father's name was Assheton?"

"Certainly; John Assheton, of the Asshetons of Pennsylvania."

John Effingham groaned aloud. When Paul stepped back equally shocked and surprised, he saw that the face of his friend was livid, and that the hand which held the picture, shook like the aspen.

"Are you unwell, dear Mr. Effingham?"

"No, no, 'tis impossible! This lady never had a child. Powis, you have been deceived by some fancied or some real resemblance. This picture is mine, and has not been out of my possession these five-and-twenty years."

"Pardon me, sir, it is the picture of my mother, and no other; the picture lost in the Montauk."

The gaze that John Effingham cast upon the young man was ghastly, and Paul was about to ring the bell, but a gesture of denial prevented him.

"See!" said John Effingham hoarsely; he touched a spring in the setting, and exposed to view the initials of two names interwoven with hair; "is this, too, yours?"

Paul looked surprised and disappointed.

“That certainly settles the question; my miniature had no such addition, and yet do I believe that sweet and pensive countenance to be the face of my own beloved mother, and of no one else.”

John Effingham struggled to appear calm, and replacing the pictures he raised the key from the dressing-case, and opening the bureau he took out the secretary. This he signed for Paul, who had the key, to open, throwing himself into a chair, though everything was done mechanically, as if his mind and body had little or no connection with each other.

“Some accidental resemblance has deceived you as to the miniatures,” he said, while Paul was looking for the proper number among the letters of Mr. Monday. “No, no, that cannot be the picture of your mother. She left no child. Assheton, did you say, was the name of your father?”

“Assheton—John Assheton,—about that, at least, there can be no mistake. This is the number at which we left off—will you, sir, or shall I read?”

The other made a sign for Paul to read, looking, at the same time, as if it were impossible for him to discharge that duty himself.

“This is a letter from the woman who appears to have been entrusted with the child to the man Dowse,” said Paul, first glancing his eye over the page. “It appears little else but gossip—ha!—what is this I see?”

John Effingham raised himself suddenly in his chair, and he sat gazing at Paul, as one gazes who expects some extraordinary development, though of what nature he knew not.

“This is a singular passage,” Paul continued, “so much so as to need elucidation. ‘I have taken the child with me to get the picture from the jeweller, who has mended the ring, and the little urchin knew it at a glance.’”

“What is there remarkable in that? Others besides ourselves have had pictures, and this child knew its own better than you.”

“Mr. Effingham, such a thing occurred to myself! It is one of those early events of which I still retain, have always retained, a vivid recollection. Though little more than an infant at the time, well do I recollect to have been taken in this manner to a jeweller’s, and the delight I felt at recovering my mother’s picture, that which is now lost, after it had not been seen for a month or two.”

“Paul Blunt—Powis—Assheton!” said John Effingham, speaking so hoarsely as to be nearly unintelligible, “remain here a few minutes—I will rejoin you.”

John Effingham arose, and notwithstanding he rallied all his powers, it was with extreme difficulty he succeeded in reaching the door, steadily rejecting the offered assistance of Paul, who was at a loss what to think of so much agitation in a man usually so self-possessed and tranquil. When out of the room John Effingham did better, and he proceeded to the library, followed by his own man, whom he had ordered to accompany him with a light.

“Desire Captain Ducie to give me the favour of his company for a moment,” he then said, motioning to the servant to withdraw. “You will not be needed any longer.”

It was but a minute before Captain Ducie stood before him. This gentleman was instantly struck with the pallid look and general agitation of the person he had come to meet, and he expressed his apprehension that he was suddenly taken ill. But a motion of the hand forbade his touching the bell cord, and he waited in silent wonder at the scene which he had been so unexpectedly called to witness.

“A glass of that water, if you please, Captain Ducie,” said John Effingham, endeavouring to smile with gentlemanly courtesy as he made the request, though the effort made his countenance appear ghastly again. A little recovered by this beverage, he said more steadily,—

“You are the cousin of Powis, Captain Ducie?”

“We are sisters’ children, sir.”

“And your mother is—”

“Lady Dunluce—a peeress in her own right.”

“But, what—her family name?”

“Her own family name has been sunk in that of my father; the Ducies claiming to be as old and as honourable a family as that from which my mother inherits her rank. Indeed the Dunluce barony has gone through so many names, by means of females, that I believe there is no intention to revive the original appellation of the family which was first summoned.”

“You mistake me—your mother, when she married, was—”

“Miss Warrender.”

“I thank you, sir, and will trouble you no longer,” returned John Effingham, rising and struggling to make his manner second the courtesy of his words. “I have troubled you abruptly—incoherently, I fear;—your arm—”

Captain Ducie stepped hastily forward, and was just in time to prevent the other from falling senseless on the floor by receiving him in his own arms.

CHAPTER XXVII.

What's Hecuba to him, or he to Hecuba,
That he should weep for her?

Hamlet.

The next morning Paul and Eve were alone in that library which had long been the scene of all the confidential communications of the Effingham family. Eve had been weeping, nor were Paul's eyes entirely free from the signs of his having given way to strong emotions. Still happiness beamed in the countenance of each, and the timid but affectionate glances with which our heroine returned the fond admiring looks of her lover, were anything but distrustful of their future felicity. Her hand was in his, and it was often raised to his lips as they pursued their conversation.

"This is so wonderful," exclaimed Eve, after one of the frequent musing pauses in which both indulged, "that I can scarcely believe myself awake. That you Blunt, Powis, Assheton, should after all prove an Effingham!"

"And that I, who have so long thought myself an orphan, should find a living father, and he a man like Mr. John Effingham!"

"I have long thought that something heavy lay at the heart of cousin Jack—you will excuse me, Powis, but I shall need time to learn to call him by a name of greater respect."

"Call him always so, love, for I am certain it would pain him to meet with any change in you. He is your cousin Jack."

"Nay, he may some day unexpectedly become my father too, as he has so wonderfully become yours," rejoined Eve, glancing archly at the glowing face of the delighted young man; "and then cousin Jack might prove too familiar and disrespectful a term."

"So much stronger does your claim to him appear than mine, that I think, when that blessed day shall arrive, Eve, it will convert him into my cousin Jack, instead of your father. But call him as you may, why do you still insist on calling me Powis?"

"That name will ever be precious in my eyes! You abridge me of my rights, in denying me a change of name. Half the young ladies of the country marry for the sake of being called Mrs. Somebody-else, instead of the Misses they were, while I am condemned to remain Eve Effingham for life."

"If you object to the appellation, I can continue to call myself Powis. This has been done so long now as almost to legalize the act."

"Indeed, no—you are an Effingham, and as an Effingham you ought to be known. What a happy lot is mine! Spared even the pain of parting with my old friends, at the great occurrence of my life, and finding my married home the same as the home of my childhood."

"I owe everything to you, Eve, name, happiness, and even a home."

"I know not that. Now that it is known you are the great grandson of Edward Effingham, I think your chance of possessing the Wigwam would be quite equal to my own, even were we to look different ways in search of married happiness. An arrangement of that nature would not be difficult to make, as John Effingham might easily compensate a daughter for the loss of her house and lands, by the means of those money-yielding stocks and bonds of which he possesses so many."

"I view it differently. You were Mr.—my father's heir—how strangely that word father sounds to these unaccustomed ears!—But you were my father's chosen heir, and I shall owe to you, dearest, in addition to the treasure of your heart and faith, my fortune."

"Are you so very certain of this, ingrate?—did not Mr. John Effingham—cousin Jack—adopt you as his son, even before he knew of the natural tie that actually exists between you?"

"True, for I perceive that you have been made acquainted with most of that which passed between us. But I hope that in telling you his own offer, my father did not forget to tell you of the terms on which it was accepted?"

"He did you ample justice, for he informed me that you stipulated there should be no altering of wills, but that the unworthy heir already chosen should still remain the heir."

"And to this Mr.——"

"Cousin Jack," said Eve laughing, for the laugh comes easy to the supremely happy.

"To this our cousin Jack assented."

"Most true again. The will would not have been altered, for your interests were already cared for."

"At the expense of yours, dearest Eve."

"It would have been at the expense of my better feelings, dearest Paul, had it not been so. However, that will can never do either harm or good to any now."

"I trust it may remain unchanged, beloved, that I may owe as much to you as possible."

Eve looked kindly at her betrothed, blushed even deeper than health or happiness had left the bloom on her cheek, and smiled like one who knew more than she cared to express.

“What secret meaning is concealed behind that look of portentous signification?”

“It means, Powis, that I have done a deed that is almost criminal: I have destroyed a will.”

“Not my father’s?”

“Even so; but it was done in his presence, and, if not absolutely with his consent, with his knowledge. When he informed me of your superior rights, I insisted on its being done at once, so that, should any accident occur, you will be heir-at-law, as a matter of course. Cousin Jack affected reluctance, but I believe he slept more sweetly for the consciousness that this act of justice had been done.”

“I fear he slept little, as it was; it was long past midnight before I left him, and the agitation of his spirits was such as to appear awful in the eyes of a son.”

“And the promised explanation is come to renew his distress. Why make it at all? Is it not enough that we are certain that you are his son? And for that have we not his solemn assurance,—the declaration of an almost dying man?”

“There should be no shade left over my mother’s fame. Faults there have been somewhere; but it is painful,—oh! how painful—for a child to think evil of a mother.”

“On this head you are already assured. Your own previous knowledge, and John Effingham’s distinct declarations, make you the child of a blameless mother.”

“Beyond question; but this sacrifice must be made to my mother’s spirit. It is now nine; the breakfast-bell will soon ring and then we are promised the whole of the melancholy tale. Pray with me, Eve, that it may be such as will not wound the ear of a son.”

Eve took the hand of Paul within both of hers, and kissed it with a sort of holy hope, that caused, in its exhibition, neither blush nor shame. Indeed so bound together were their young hearts, so ample and confiding had been the confessions of both, and so pure their love, that neither regarded such a manifestation of the other’s feelings differently from what an acknowledgment of a dependance on any other sacred principle would have been esteemed. The bell now summoned them to the breakfast-table, and Eve, yielding to her sex’s timidity, desired Paul to precede her a few minutes, that the sanctity of their confidence might not be weakened by the observation of profane eyes.

The meal was silent, the discovery of the previous night, which had been made known to all in the house by the declarations of John Effingham, as soon as he was restored to his senses, Captain Ducie having innocently collected those within hearing to his succour, causing a kind of moral suspense that weighed heavily on the vivacity and comfort of the whole party, the lovers alone excepted. As profound happiness is seldom talkative, the meal was a silent one; and when it was ended, they who had no tie of blood with the parties most concerned in the revelations of the approaching interview delicately separated, making employments and engagements that left the family at liberty, while those who had been previously notified that their presence would be acceptable, silently repaired to the dressing-room of John Effingham. The latter party was composed of Mr. Effingham, Paul, and Eve only. The first passed into his cousin's bed-room, where he had a private conference that lasted half an hour. At the end of that time the two others were summoned to join them.

John Effingham was a strong-minded and a proud man, his governing fault being the self-reliance that indisposed him to throw himself on a greater power for the support, guidance, and counsel that all need. To humiliation before God, however, he was not unused, and of late years it had become frequent with him, for it was only in connection with his fellow-creatures that his repugnance to admitting even of an equality existed. He felt how much more just, intuitive, conscientious even, his own views were than those of most of mankind in general, and he seldom deigned to consult with any as to the opinions he ought to entertain, or the conduct he ought to pursue. It is scarcely necessary to say that such a being was one of strong and engrossing passions, the impulses frequently proving too imperious for the affections, or even principles. The scene that he was now compelled to go through was consequently one of sore mortification and self-abasement; and yet, feeling its justice no less than its necessity, and having made up his mind to discharge what had now become a duty, his very pride of character led him to do it manfully, and with no uncalled-for reserves. It was a painful and humiliating task, notwithstanding, and it required all the self-command, all the sense of right, and all the clear perception of the consequences, that one so quick to discriminate could not fail to detect, to enable him to go through it with the required steadiness and connection.

John Effingham received Paul and Eve, seated in an easy chair; for, while he could not be said to be ill, it was evident that his frame had been shaken by the events and emotions of the few preceding hours. He gave a hand to each, and, drawing Eve affectionately to him, he imprinted a kiss on a cheek that was burning, though it paled and reddened in quick succession, the herald of the tumultuous thoughts within. The look he gave Paul was kind and welcome, though a hectic spot glowed on each cheek, betraying that his presence excited pain as well as pleasure. A long pause succeeded this meeting, when John Effingham at last broke the silence.

“There can now be no manner of question, my dear Paul,” he said, smiling affectionately, but sadly, as he looked at the young man, “about your being my son. The letters written by John Assheton to your mother, after the separation of your parents, would settle that important point, had not the names, and the other facts that have come to our knowledge, already convinced me of the precious truth, for precious and very dear to me is the knowledge that I am the father of so worthy a child. You must prepare yourself to hear things that it will not be pleasant for a son to listen to.”

“No, no, cousin Jack—dear cousin Jack,” cried Eve, throwing herself into her kinsman’s arms, “we will hear nothing of the sort. It is sufficient for us that you are Paul’s father, and we wish to hear no more,—will hear no more.”

“This is like yourself, Eve, but it will not answer what I conceive to be the dictates of duty. Paul had two parents, and not the slightest suspicion ought to rest on one of them, in order to spare the feelings of the other. In showing me this kindness you are treating Paul inconsiderately.”

“I beg, dear sir, you will not think too much of me, but entirely consult your own judgment—your own sense—in short, my father, that you will consider yourself before your son.”

“I thank you, my children—what a word, and what a novel sensation is this for me, Ned! I feel all your kindness, but if you would consult my peace of mind, and wish me to regain my self-respect, you will allow me to disburthen my soul of the weight that oppresses it. This is strong language; but, while I have no confessions of deliberate criminality or of positive vice to make, I feel it will be hardly too strong for the facts.” Here John Effingham paused, as if to recollect himself, and then he proceeded, with a seriousness of manner that caused every syllable he uttered to tell on the ears of his listeners. “It is well known to your father, Eve, though it will probably be new to you,” he said, “that I felt a passion for your sainted mother such as few men ever experience for any of your sex. Your father and myself were suitors for her favour at the same time, though I can scarcely say, Edward, that any feeling of rivalry entered into the competition.”

“You do me no more than justice, John, for if the affection of my beloved Eve could cause me grief, it was because it brought you pain.”

“I had the additional mortification of approving of the choice she made, for, certainly, as respected her own happiness, your mother did more wisely in confiding it to the regulated, mild, and manly virtues of your father, than in placing her hopes in one so violent and eccentric as myself.”

“This is injustice, John; you may have been positive, and a little stern at times, but never violent, and least of all with a woman.”

“Call it what you will; it unfitted me to make one so meek, gentle, and yet high-souled, so entirely happy as she deserved to be, and as you did make her while she remained on earth. I had the courage to stay and learn that my kinsman was accepted, (though the marriage was kindly deferred two years, in consideration for my feelings,) and then, with a heart in which mortified pride, wounded love, and a resentment which was aimed rather against myself than against your parents, were alike contending, I quitted them, with a desperate determination never to rejoin my family again. This resolution I did not acknowledge to myself even, but it lurked in my intentions unowned, festering like a mortal disease; and it caused me, when I burst away from the scene of happiness of which I had been a compelled witness, to change my name, and to make several inconsistent and extravagant arrangements, even to the abandonment of my native country.”

“Poor John!” exclaimed his cousin involuntarily; “this would have been a blot on our felicity, had we known it!”

“I was certain of that, even when most writhing under the blow you had so unintentionally inflicted, Ned; but the passions are tyrannical and inconsistent masters. I took my mother’s name, changed my servant, and avoided those parts of the country where I was known. At this time I trembled for my reason, and the thought crossed my mind that by making a sudden marriage I might supplant the old passion, which was so near destroying me, by some of that gentler affection which seemed to render you so blessed, Edward.”

“Nay, John, this was truly a temporary tottering of the reasoning faculties.”

“It was simply the effect of passions, over which reason had never been taught to exercise a sufficient influence. Chance brought me acquainted with Miss Warrender in one of the Southern States, and she promised, as I fancied, to realize all my wild schemes of happiness and resentment.”

“Resentment, John!”

“I fear I must confess it, Edward, though it produce anger against myself. I first made Miss Warrender’s acquaintance as John Assheton, and some months had passed before I determined to try the fearful experiment I have mentioned. She was young, beautiful, well-born, virtuous, and good; if she had a fault, it was her high spirit—not high temper—but she was high-souled and proud.”

“Thank God for this!” burst from the inmost soul of Paul, with unrestrainable feeling.

“You have little to apprehend, my son, on the subject of your mother’s character; if not perfect, she was wanting in no womanly virtue, and might, nay, ought to have made any reasonable man happy. My offer was accepted, for I found her heart disengaged. Miss Warrender was not affluent, and in addition to the other unjustifiable motives that influenced me, I thought there would be a satisfaction in believing that I had been chosen for myself rather than for my wealth. Indeed I became distrustful and ungenerous, and then I disliked the confession of the weakness that had induced me to change my name. The simple, I might almost say, loose laws of this country on the subject of marriage, removed all necessity for explanation, no banns nor licence being necessary, and the Christian name being only used in the ceremony. We were married, therefore; but I was not so far unmindful of the rights of others as to neglect to procure a certificate, under a promise of secrecy, in my own name. By going to the place where the ceremony was performed, you will also find the marriage of John Effingham and Mildred Warrender duly registered in the books of the church to which the officiating clergyman belonged. So far, I did what justice required, though with a motiveless infatuation, for which I can now hardly account, which cannot be accounted for, except by ascribing it to the inconsistent cruelty of passion, I concealed my real name from her with whom there should have been no concealment. I fancied—I tried to fancy—I was no impostor, as I was of the family I represented myself to be, by the mother’s side, and I wished to believe my peace would easily be made when I avowed myself to be the man I really was. I had found Miss Warrender and her sister living with a well-intentioned but weak aunt, and with no male relative to make those inquiries which would so naturally have suggested themselves to persons of ordinary worldly prudence. It is true I had become known to them under favourable circumstances, and they had good reason to believe me an Assheton, from some accidental evidence that I possessed, which unanswerably proved my affinity to that family, without betraying my true name. But there is so little distrust in this country, that by keeping at a distance from the places in which I was personally known, a life might have been passed without exposure.”

“This was all wrong, dear cousin Jack,” said Eve, taking his hand and affectionately kissing it, while her face kindled with a sense of her sex’s rights, “and I should be unfaithful to my womanhood were I to say otherwise. You had entered into the most solemn of all human contracts, and evil is the omen when such an engagement is veiled by an untruth. But still you might have been happy with a virtuous and affectionate wife!”

“Alas! it is but a hopeless experiment to marry one, while the heart is still yearning towards another. Confidence came too late, for, discovering my unhappiness, Mildred exacted a tardy confession from me, a confession of all but the concealment of the true name, and justly wounded at the deception of which she had been the dupe, and yielding to the impulses of a high and generous spirit, she announced to me that she was unwilling to continue the wife of any man on such terms. We parted, and I hastened into the Southwestern States, where I passed the next twelvemonth in travelling, hastening from place to place, in the vain hope of obtaining peace of mind. I plunged into the prairies, and most of the time mentioned was lost to me, as respects the world, in the company of hunters and trappers.”

“This then explains your knowledge of that section of the country,” exclaimed Mr. Effingham, “for which I have never been able to account. We thought you among your old friends in Carolina all that time.”

“No one knew where I had secreted myself, for I passed under another feigned name, and had no servant even. I had, however, sent an address to Mildred, where a letter would find me, for I had begun to feel a sincere affection for her, though it might not have amounted to passion, and looked forward to being re-united to her, when her wounded feelings had time to regain their tranquillity. The obligations of wedlock are too serious to be lightly thrown aside, and I felt persuaded that neither of us would be satisfied in the end, without discharging the duties of the state into which we had entered.”

“And why did you not hasten to your wife, cousin Jack,” Eve demanded, “as soon as you returned to the settlements?”

“Alas! my dear girl, I found letters at Saint Louis announcing her death. Nothing was said of any child, nor did I in the least suspect that I was about to become a father. When Mildred died, I thought all the ties, all the obligations, all the traces of my ill-judged marriage were extinct; and the course taken by her relations, of whom in this country there remained very few, left me no inclination to proclaim it. By observing silence, I continued to pass as a bachelor of course, though, had there been any apparent reason for avowing what had occurred,

I think no one who knows me would suppose I would have shrunk from doing so."

"May I inquire, my dear sir," asked Paul with a timidity of manner that betrayed how tenderly he felt it necessary to touch on the subject at all;—"may I inquire, my dear sir, what was the course adopted by my mother's relatives?"

"I never knew Mr. Warrender, my wife's brother, but he had the reputation of being a haughty and an exacting man. His letters were not friendly—scarcely tolerable; for he affected to believe I had given a false address at the West, when I was residing in the Middle States, and he threw out hints that then were inexplicable, but which the letters left with me by Paul have sufficiently explained. I thought him cruel and unfeeling at the time, but he had an excuse for his conduct."

"Which was, sir—?" Paul eagerly inquired.

"I perceive by the letters you have given me, my son, that your mother's family had imbibed the opinion that I was John Assheton of Lancaster, a man of singular humours, who had made an unfortunate marriage in Spain, and whose wife, I believe, is still living in Paris, though lost to herself and her friends. My kinsman lived retired, and never recovered the blow. As he was one of the few persons of the name who could have married your mother, her relatives appear to have taken up the idea that he had been guilty of bigamy, and of course that Paul was illegitimate. Mr. Warrender, by his letters, appears even to have had an interview with him, and, on mentioning his wife, was rudely repulsed from the house. It was a proud family, and, Mildred being dead, the concealment of the birth of her child was resorted to, as a means of averting a fancied disgrace. As for myself, I call the all-seeing eye of God to witness that the thought of my being a parent never crossed my mind until I learned that a John Assheton was the father of Paul, and that the miniature of Mildred Warrender, that I received at the period of our engagement, was the likeness of his mother. The simple declaration of Captain Ducie concerning the family name of his mother removed all doubt."

"But, cousin Jack, did not the mention of Lady Dunluce, of the Ducies, and of Paul's connexions, excite curiosity?"

"Concerning what, dear?—I could have no curiosity concerning a child of whose existence I was ignorant. I did know that the Warrenders had pretensions to both rank and fortune in England, but never heard the title, and cared nothing about money that would not probably be Mildred's. Of General Ducie I never even heard, as he married Mabel Warrender after my separation, and subsequently to the receipt of my brother-in-law's letters.

I wished to forget the existence of the family. I went to Europe, and remained abroad seven years, and, as this was at a time when the Continent was closed against the English, I was not in a way to hear anything on the subject. On my return, my wife's aunt was dead, the last of my wife's brothers was dead; her sister must then have long been Mrs. Ducie; no one mentioned the Warrenders, all traces of whom were nearly lost in this country, and to me the subject was too painful to be either sought or dwelt on. It is a curious fact that during our late visit to the other hemisphere, I ascended the Nile, in 1829, with General Ducie as a travelling companion. We met at Alexandria, and went to the cataracts, and returned in company. He knew me as John Effingham, an American traveller of fortune, if of no particular merit, and I knew him as an agreeable English general officer. He had the reserve of an Englishman of rank, and seldom spoke of his family, and it was only on our return that I found he had letters from his wife, Lady Dunluce; but little did I dream that Lady Dunluce was Mabel Warrender. How often are we on the verge of important information, and yet live on in ignorance and obscurity! The Ducies appear finally to have arrived at the opinion that the marriage was legal, and that no reproach rests on the birth of Paul, by the inquiries made concerning the eccentric John Assheton."

"They fancied, in common with my uncle Warrender, for a long time, that the John Assheton whom you have mentioned, sir," said Paul, "was my father. But some accidental information, at a late day, convinced them of their error, and then they naturally enough supposed that it was the only other John Assheton that could be heard of, who passes, and probably with sufficient reason, for a bachelor. This latter gentleman I have myself always supposed to be my father, though he has treated two or three letters I have written to him with the indifference with which one would be apt to treat the pretensions of an impostor. Pride has prevented me from attempting to renew the correspondence lately."

"It is John Assheton of Nescopeck, my mother's brother's son, as inveterate a bachelor as is to be found in the Union," said John Effingham, smiling, in spite of the grave subject and deep emotions that had so lately been uppermost in his thoughts. "He must have supposed your letters were an attempt at mystification on the part of some of his jocular associates, and I am surprised that he thought it necessary to answer them at all."

"He did answer but one, and that reply had certainly something of the character you suggest, sir. I freely forgive him, now I understand the truth, though his apparent contempt gave me many a bitter pang at the time. I saw Mr. Assheton once in public, and observed him well; for, strange as it is, I have been thought to resemble him."

"Why strange? Jack Assheton and myself have, or rather had, a strong family likeness to each other, and, though the thought is new to me, I can now easily trace this resemblance to myself. It is rather an Assheton than an Effingham look, though the latter is not wanting."

"These explanations are very clear and satisfactory," observed Mr. Effingham, "and leave no doubt that Paul is the child of John Effingham and Mildred Warrender; but they would be beyond all cavil, were the infancy of the boy placed in an equally plain point of view, and could the reasons be known why the Warrenders abandoned him to the care of those who yielded him up to Mr. Powis."

"I see but little obscurity in that," returned John Effingham. "Paul is unquestionably the child referred to in the papers left by poor Monday, to the care of whose mother he was entrusted until she yielded him to Mr. Powis, in his fourth year, to get rid of the trouble and expense, while she kept the annuity granted by Lady Dunluce. The names appear in the concluding letters, and, had we read the letter through at first, we should earlier have arrived at the same conclusion. Could we find the man called Douse, who appears to have instigated the fraud, and who married Mrs. Monday, the whole thing would be explained."

"Of this I am aware," said Paul, for he and John Effingham had perused the remainder of the Monday papers together as soon after the fainting fit of the latter as his strength would admit, "and Captain Truck is now searching for an old passenger of his who, I think, will furnish the clue. Should we get this evidence, it will settle all legal questions."

"Such questions will never be raised," said John Effingham, holding out his hand affectionately to his son. "You possess the marriage certificate given to your mother, and I avow myself to have been the person therein styled John Assheton. This fact I have endorsed on the back of the certificate, while here is another given to me in my proper name, with an endorsement made by the clergyman that I passed by another name at the ceremony."

"Such a man, cousin Jack, was unworthy of his cloth," said Eve with emphasis.

"I do not think so, my child, for he was ignorant of the original deception. The certificate and entry in the church books were both made some time after the marriage, and might do good, whereas they could not do harm. The clergyman in question is now a bishop, and is still living. He may give evidence, if necessary, to the legality of the marriage."

"And the clergyman by whom I was baptized is also alive," cried Paul, "and has never lost sight of me. He was, in part, in the confidence of my mother's family; and even after I was adopted by Mr. Powis, he kept me in view as one of his little Christians, as he termed me. It was no less a person than Dr.——"

"This alone would make out the connexion and identity," said Mr. Effingham, "without the aid of the Monday witnesses. The whole obscurity has arisen from John's change of name, and his ignorance of the fact that his wife had a child. The Ducies appear to have had plausible reasons, too, for distrusting the legality of the marriage; but all is now clear, and, as a large estate is concerned, we will take care that no further obscurity shall rest over the affair."

"The part connected with the estate is already secured," said John Effingham, looking at Eve with a smile. "An American can always make a will, and one that contains but a single bequest is soon written. Mine is executed, and 'Paul Effingham, my son by my marriage with Mildred Warrender, and lately known in the U. S. Navy as Paul Powis,' is duly declared my heir. This will suffice for all legal purposes, though we shall have large draughts of gossip to swallow."

"Cousin Jack!"

"Daughter Eve!"

"Who has given cause for it?"

"He who commenced one of the most sacred of all his earthly duties with an unjustifiable deception. The wisest way to meet it will be to make our avowals of the relationship as open as possible."

"I see no necessity, John, of entering into details," said Mr. Effingham; "you were married young, and lost your wife within a year of your marriage. She was a Miss Warrender, and the sister of Lady Dunluce; Paul and Ducie are declared cousins, and the former proves to be your son, of whose existence you were ignorant. No one will presume to question any of us, and it really strikes me that all rational people ought to be satisfied with this simple account of the matter."

"Father!" exclaimed Eve, with her pretty little hands raised in the attitude of surprise, "in what capital even, in what part of the world, would such a naked account appease curiosity? Much less will it suffice here, where every human being, gentle or simple, learned or ignorant, refined or vulgar, fancies himself a constitutional judge of all the acts of all his fellow-creatures."

"We have at least the consolation of knowing that no revelations will make the matter any worse or any better," said Paul, "as the gossips would tell their own tale in every case, though its falsehood were as apparent as the noon-day sun. A gossip is essentially a liar, and truth is the last ingredient that is deemed necessary to his or her qualifications; indeed a well-authenticated fact is a death-blow to a gossip. I hope, therefore, my dear sir, you will say no more than that I am your son, a circumstance much too precious to me to be omitted."

John Effingham looked affectionately at the noble young man whom he had so long esteemed and admired, and the tears forced themselves to his eyes, as he felt the supreme happiness that can gladden a parent's heart only.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

For my part, I care not : I say little ; but when the time comes there shall be smiles.

N.Y.M.

Although Paul Effingham was right, and Eve Effingham was also right, in their opinions of the art of gossiping, they both forgot one qualifying circumstance, which, arising from a different cause, produces the same effect equally in a capital and in a province. In the former, marvels form a nine days' wonder from the hurry of events; in the latter, from the hurry of talking. When it was announced in Templeton that Mr. John Effingham had discovered a son in Mr. Powis, as that son had conjectured, everything but the truth was rumoured and believed, in connection with the circumstance. Of course it excited a good deal of a natural and justifiable curiosity and surprise in the trained and intelligent, for John Effingham had passed for a confirmed bachelor; but they were generally content to suffer a family to have feelings and incidents that were not to be paraded before a neighbourhood. Having some notions themselves of the delicacy and sanctity of the domestic affections, they were willing to respect the same sentiments in others. But, these few excepted, the village was in a tumult of surmises, reports, contradictions, confirmations, rebutters, and sur-rebutters, for a fortnight. Several village élégants, whose notions of life were obtained in the valley in which they were born, and who had turned up their noses at the quiet, reserved, gentlemanly Paul, because he did not happen to suit their tastes, were disposed to resent his claim to be his father's son, as if it were an injustice done to themselves; such commentators on men and things uniformly bringing everything down to the standard of self. Then the approaching marriages at the Wigwam had to run the gauntlet, not only of village and county criticism, but that of the mighty emporium itself, as it is the fashion to call the confused and tasteless collection of flaring red brick houses, marten-box churches, and colossal taverns, that stand on the island of Manhattan; the discussion of marriages being the topic of principal interest in that well-regulated social organization, after the subjects of dollars, lots, and wines have been duly exhausted. Sir George Templemore was transformed into the Honourable Lord George Templemore, and Paul's relationship to Lady Dunluce was converted, as usual, into his being the heir apparent of a duchy of that name; Eve's preference for a nobleman, was, as a matter of course, ascribed to the aristocratical tastes imbibed during a residence in foreign countries; Eve, the intellectual, feminine, instructed Eve, whose European associations, while they had taught her to prize the refinement, grace, retinue, and tone of an advanced condition of society, had also taught her to despise its mere covering and glitter! But, as there is no protection against falsehood, so is there no reasoning with ignorance.

A sacred few, at the head of whom were Mr. Steadfast Dodge and Mrs. widow-bewitched Abbot, treated the matter as one of greater gravity, and as possessing an engrossing interest for the entire community.

"For my part, Mr. Dodge," said Mrs. Abbot, in one of their frequent conferences, about a fortnight after the éclaircissement of the last chapter, "I do not believe that Paul Powis is Paul Effingham at all. You say that you knew him by the name of Blunt when he was a younger man?"

"Certainly, ma'am. He passed universally by that name formerly, and it may be considered as at least extraordinary that he should have had so many aliases. The truth of the matter is, Mrs. Abbot, if truth could be come at, which I always contend is very difficult in the present state of the world——"

"You never said a juster thing, Mr. Dodge!" interrupted the lady for feelings impetuous as hers seldom waited for the completion of a sentence,—"I never can get hold of the truth of anything. Now you may remember you insinuated that Mr. John Effingham himself was to be married to Eve, and lo, and behold! it turns out to be to his son!"

"The lady may have changed her mind, Mrs. Abbot; she gets the same estate with a younger man."

“She’s monstrous! And I’m sure it will be a relief to the whole village when she is married, let it be to the father or to the son. Now, do you know, Mr. Dodge, I have been in a desperate taking about one thing, and that is to find that, bony-fie-dy, the two old Effinghams are not actually brothers! I knew that they called each other cousin Jack and cousin Ned, and that Eve affected to call her uncle cousin Jack, but then she has so many affectations, and the old people are so foreignified, that I looked upon all that as mere pretence; I said to myself, a neighbourhood ought to know better about a man’s family than he can know himself, and the neighbourhood all declared they were brothers; and yet it turns out, after all, that they are only cousins!”

“Yes, I do believe that, for once, the family was right in that matter, and that the public was mistaken.”

“Well, I should like to know who has a better right to be mistaken than the public, Mr. Dodge? This is a free country, and if the people can’t sometimes be wrong, what is the mighty use of their freedom? We are all sinful wretches at the best, and it is vain to look for anything but vice from sinners.”

“Nay, my dear Mrs. Abbot, you are too hard on yourself, for everybody allows that you are as exemplary as you are devoted to your religious duties.”

“Oh! I was not speaking particularly of myself, sir; I am no egotist in such things, and wish to leave my own imperfections to the charity of my friends and neighbours. But do you think, Mr. Dodge, that a marriage between Paul Effingham, for so I suppose he must be called, and Eve Effingham, will be legal? Can’t it be set aside, and if that should be the case, wouldn’t the fortune go to the public?”

“It ought to be so, my dear ma’am, and I trust the day is not distant when it will be so. The people are beginning to understand their rights, and another century will not pass before they will enforce them by all the necessary penal statutes. We have got matters so now, that a man can no longer indulge in the aristocratic and selfish desire to make a will, and take my word for it, we shall not stop until we bring everything to the proper standard.”

The reader is not to suppose from his language that Mr. Dodge was an Agrarian, or that he looked forward to a division of property at some future day; for, possessing in his own person already more than could possibly fall to an individual share, he had not the smallest desire to lessen its amount by a general division. In point of fact, he did not know his own meaning, except as he felt envy of all above him; in which, in truth, was to be found the whole secret of his principles, his impulses, and his doctrines. Anything that would pull down those whom education, habits, fortune, or tastes had placed in positions more conspicuous than his own, was in his eyes reasonable and just; as anything that would serve him, in person, the same ill turn would have been tyranny and oppression. The institutions of America, like everything human, have their bad as well as their good side; and, while we firmly believe in the relative ascendancy of the latter, as compared with the results of other systems, we should fail of accomplishing the end set before us in this work, did we not exhibit in strong colours one of the most prominent consequences that have attended the entire destruction of factitious personal distinctions in the country, which have certainly aided in bringing out in bolder relief than common, that prevalent disposition in man to covet that which is in the possession of another, and to decry merits that are unattainable.

"I rejoice to hear this," returned Mrs. Abbot, whose principles were of the same loose school as those of her companion, "for I think no one should have rights but those who have experienced religion, if you would keep morality in a country. There go that old sea-lion Truck, and his fishing associate the commodore, with their lines and poles, as usual. Mr. Dodge, do call them, for I long to hear what the first can have to say about his beloved Effinghams now!"

Mr. Dodge complied, and the navigator of the ocean and the navigator of the lake were soon seated in Mrs. Abbot's little parlour, which might be styled the focus of gossip, near the two who were so lately its sole occupants.

"This is wonderful news, gentlemen," commenced Mrs. Abbot, as soon as the little bustle of the entrance had subsided. "Mr. Powis is Mr. Effingham, and it seems that Miss Effingham is to become Mrs. Effingham! Miracles will never cease, and I look upon this as one of the most surprising of my time."

"Just so, ma'am," said the commodore, winking his eye, and giving the usual flourish with a hand; "your time has not been that of a day only, and Mr. Powis has reason to rejoice that he is the hero of such a history. For my part, I could not have been more astonished, were I to bring up the Sogdollager with a trout-hook, having a cheese-paring for the bait."

"I understand," continued the lady, "that there are doubts, after all, whether this miracle be a true miracle. It is hinted that Mr. Powis is neither Mr. Effingham nor Mr. Powis, but that he is actually a Mr. Blunt. Do you know anything of the matter, Captain Truck?"

"I have been introduced, ma'am, by all three names, and I consider him as an acquaintance in each character. I can assure you, moreover, that he is A. No. 1, on which ever tack you take him; a man who carries a weather-helm in the midst of his enemies."

"Well, I do not consider it a very great recommendation for one to be A. No. 1, or even No. 2; or have enemies at all. Now I dare say, Mr. Dodge, you have not an enemy on earth?"

"I should be sorry to think I had, Mrs. Abbot. I am every man's friend, particularly the poor man's friend, and I should suppose that every man ought to be my friend. I hold the whole human family to be brethren, and that they ought to live together as such."

"Very true, sir—quite true; we are all sinners, and ought to look favourably on each other's failings. It is no business of mine—I say it is no business of ours, Mr. Dodge, who Miss Effingham marries; but were she my daughter, I do think I should not like her to have three family names, and to keep her own in the bargain!"

"The Effinghams hold their heads very much up, though it is not easy to see why; but so they do, and the more names the better, perhaps, for such people," returned the editor. "For my part, I treat them with condescension, just as I do everybody else; for it is a rule with me, Captain Truck, to make use of the same deportment to a king on his throne, as I would to a beggar in the street."

"I understand—merely to show that you do not feel yourself to be above your betters. We have many such philosophers in this country."

"Just so," said the commodore.

"I wish I knew," resumed Mrs. Abbot, for there existed such a confusion in her head, as well as in that of Mr. Dodge, such a total confusion on the subject of deportment, that she neither saw nor felt the cool sarcasm of the old sailor; "I wish I knew, now, whether Eve Effingham has really been regenerated! What is your opinion, commodore?"

"Re-what, ma'am?" said the commodore, who was not conscious of ever having heard the word before; for, in his sabbaths on the water, where he often worshipped God devoutly in his heart, the language of the professedly pious was never heard. "I can only say she is as pretty a skiff as floats, but I can tell you nothing about resuscitation — indeed I never heard of her having been drowned."

"Oh, Mrs. Abbot, the very best friends of the Effinghams will not maintain that they are pious. I do not wish to be indivious, or to say unneighbourly things; but were I upon oath, I could testify to a great many things which would unqualifiedly show that none of them have ever experienced, or even been exercised. ”

“ Now, Mr. Dodge, you know how much I dislike scandal,” the widow-bewitched cried affectedly, “ and I cannot tolerate such a sweeping charge. I insist on the proofs of what you say, in which, no doubt, these gentlemen will cordially join me. ”

By proofs Mrs. Abbot merely meant allegations.

“ Well, ma’am, since you insist on my proving what I have said, you shall not be disappointed. In the first place, then, they read their family prayers out of a book. ”

“ Ay, ay,” said the captain, “ but all who do not hold on to the platform do that. ”

“ Your pardon, sir,—no people but the Catholics and the church people commit this impiety. The idea of reading to the Deity, Mrs. Abbot, is particularly shocking to a pious soul. ”

“ As if the Lord stood in need of a reader ! That is very bad, I allow, for at family prayers a form becomes mockery. ”

“ Yes, ma’am, but what do you think of cards ? ”

“ Cards ! ” exclaimed Mrs. Abbot, holding up her pious hands in holy horror.

“ Even so ; foul paste-board, marked with kings and queens. Why, this is worse than a common sin, Mrs. Abbot, being unqualifiedly anti-republican. ”

“ I confess I did not expect this ! I had heard that Eve Effingham was guilty of indiscretions, but I did not think she was so lost to virtue as to touch a card. Oh ! Eve Effingham, Eve Effingham, for what is your poor diseased soul destined ! ”

“ She dances too—I suppose you know that,” continued Mr. Dodge, who, finding his popularity a little on the wane, had joined the meeting himself a few weeks before, and who did not fail to manifest the zeal of a new convert. ”

“ Dances ! ” repeated Mrs. Abbot, in holy horror.

“ Reels, jigs, and fiddle-de-di ! ” echoed Captain Truck.

“ Just so,” observed the commodore ; “ I have seen it with my own eyes. But, Mrs. Abbot, I feel bound to tell you that your own daughter—”

“ Biansy Alzummy Anne ! ” exclaimed the mother in alarm.

“ Just so ; My-Aunty-and-sue-me-Anne, if that is her name. Do you know, ma’am, that I have seen your own blessed daughter My-Aunty-Anne, do a worse thing, even, than dancing ? ”

“ Commodore, you are awful ! what could a child of mine do that is worse than dancing ? ”

“ Why, ma’am, if you will hear all, it is my duty to tell you. I saw Aunty-Anne (the commodore was really ignorant of the girl’s name), jump a skipping-rope, yesterday morning, between the hours of seven and eight. As I hope to see the Sogdollager again, ma'am, I did."

"And do you call this as bad as dancing?"

"Much worse, ma'am, to my notion. It is jumping about without music, and without any beauty, particularly as it was performed by My-Aunty-Anne."

"You are given to light jokes. Jumping the skipping-rope is not forbidden in the Bible."

"Just so; nor is dancing, if I know anything about it; nor, for that matter, cards."

"But waste of time is—a sinful waste of time, and evil passions, and all unrighteousness."

"Just so; My-Aunty-Anne was going to the pump for water—I dare say you sent her—and she was mis-spending her time; and as for evil passions, she did not enjoy the hop until she and your neighbour's daughter had pulled each other's hair for the rope, as if they had been two she-dragons. Take my word for it, ma'am, it wanted for nothing to make it sin of the purest water but a cracked fiddle."

While the commodore was holding Mrs. Abbot at bay in this manner, Captain Truck, who had given him a wink to that effect, was employed in playing off a practical joke at the expense of the widow. It was one of the standing amusements of these worthies, who had become sworn friends and constant associates, after they had caught as many fish as they wished, to retire to the favourite spring, light the one his segar, the other his pipe, mix their grog, and then relieve their ennui, when tired of discussing men and things, by playing all-fours on a particular stump. Now, it happened that the captain had the identical pack which had been used on all such occasions in his pocket, as was evident in the fact that the cards were nearly as distinctly marked on their backs as on their faces. These cards he showed secretly to his companion, and when the attention of Mrs. Abbot was altogether engaged in expecting the terrible announcement of her daughter's errors, the captain slipped them, king, queens, and knaves, high, low, jack, and the game, altogether, into the lady's work-basket. As soon as this feat was successfully performed, a sign was given to the commodore that the conspiracy was effected; and the disputant in theology gradually began to give ground, though he continued to the last to maintain that jumping the rope was a sin, albeit it might be one of the venial class. There is little doubt, had he possessed a smattering of phrases, a greater command of biblical learning, and more zeal, that the fisherman might have established a new shade of Christian faith; for while mankind still persevere in disregarding the plainest mandates of God, as respects humility, the charities, and obedience, nothing seems to afford them more delight than to add to the catalogue of the offences against his divine supremacy. It was perhaps lucky for the commodore, who was capital at casting a pickarel line, but who usually settled his polemics with the fist when hard pushed, that Captain Truck now found leisure to come to the rescue.

"I'm amazed, ma'am," said the honest packet-master, "that a woman of your sanctity should deny that jumping the rope is a sin; for I hold that point to have been settled by all our people these fifty years. You will admit that the rope cannot be well jumped without levity."

"Levity, Captain Truck! I hope you do not insinuate that a daughter of mine discovers levity?"

"Certainly, ma'am; she is called the best rope-jumper in the village, I hear; and levity, or lightness of carriage, is the great requisite for skill in the art. Then there are 'vain repetitions,' in doing the same thing over and over so often, and 'vain repetitions' are forbidden even in our prayers—I can call both father and mother to testify to that fact."

"Well, this is news to me! I must speak to the minister about it."

"Of the two, the skipping-rope is rather more sinful than dancing, for the music makes the latter easy, whereas one has to force the spirit to enter into the other. Commodore, our hour has come, and we must make sail. May I ask the favour, Mrs. Abbot, of a bit of thread to fasten this hook afresh?"

The widow-bewitched turned to her basket, and raising a piece of calico, to look for the thread, 'high, low, jack, and the game' stared her full in the face. When she bent her eyes towards her guests, she perceived all three gazing at the cards, with as much apparent surprise and curiosity as if two of them knew nothing of their history.

"Awful!" exclaimed Mrs. Abbot, "awful, awful! The powers of darkness have been at work here!"

"They seem to have been pretty much occupied, too," observed the captain coolly, "for a better-thumbed pack I never yet found in the forecastle of a ship."

"Awful, awful, awful! This is equal to the forty days in the wilderness, Mr. Dodge."

"It is a trying cross, indeed, ma'am."

"To my notion, now," said the captain, "those cards are not worse than the skipping-rope, though I allow that they might have been cleaner."

But Mrs. Abbot was not disposed to view the matter solightly.

She saw the hand of the devil in the affair, and fancied it was a new trial offered to her widowed condition.

"Are these actually cards?" she cried, like one who distrusted the evidences of her senses.

"Just so, ma'am," kindly answered the commodore; "this is the ace of spades, a famous fellow to hold when you have the lead; and this is the jack, which counts one, you know, when spades are trumps. I never saw a more thoroughly working pack in my life."

"Or a more thoroughly worked pack," added the captain, with a condoling manner.

"Well, we are not all perfect, and I hope Mrs. Abbot will cheer up, and look at this matter in a gayer point of view. For myself, I hold that a skipping-rope is worse than the jack of spades, Sundays or week-days. Commodore, we shall see no pickarel to-day, unless we tear ourselves from this good company."

Here the two wags took their leave, and retreated to the skiff; the captain, who foresaw an occasion to use them, considerately offering to relieve Mrs. Abbot from the odious presence of the cards, intimating that he would conscientiously see them fairly sunk in the deepest part of the lake.

When the two worthies were at a reasonable distance from the shore, the commodore suddenly ceased rowing, made a flourish with his hand, and incontinently began to laugh, as if his mirth had suddenly broken through all restraint. Captain Truck, who had been lighting a segar, commenced smoking; and seldom indulging in boisterous merriment, he responded with his eyes, shaking his head from time to time, with great satisfaction, as thoughts more ludicrous than common came over his imagination.

"Harkee, commodore," he said, blowing the smoke upward, and watching it with his eye until it floated away in a little cloud, "neither of us is a chicken. You have studied life on the fresh water, and I have studied life on the salt. I do not say which produces the best scholars, but I know that both make better Christians than the jack-screw system."

"Just so. I tell them in the village that little is gained in the end by following the blind; that is my doctrine, sir."

"And a very good doctrine it would prove, I make no doubt, were you to enter into it a little more fully—"

"Well, sir, I can explain—"

"Not another syllable is necessary. I now what you mean as well as if I had said it myself; and moreover, short sermons are always the best. You mean that a pilot ought to know where he is steering, which is perfectly sound doctrine. My own experience tells me that if you press a sturgeon's nose with your foot, it will spring up as soon as it is loosened, Now the jack-screw will heave a great strain, no doubt, but the moment it is let up, down all that rests on it comes again. This Mr. Dodge, I suppose you know, has been a passenger with me once or twice?"

"I have heard as much—they say he was tigerish in the fight with the niggers—quite an out-and-outer."

"Ay, I hear he tells some such story himself; but, heark'ee, commodore, I wish to do justice to all men, and I find there is very little of it, inland, hereaway. The hero of that day is about to marry your beautiful Miss Effingham; other men did their duty too, as for instance was the case with Mr. John Effingham, but Paul Blunt—Powis—Effingham, finished the job. As for Mr. Steadfast Dodge, sir, I say nothing, unless it be to add that he was nowhere near me in the action; and if any man felt like a hungry alligator on that occasion it was your humble servant."

"Which means that he was not nigh the enemy, I 'll swear before a magistrate."

"And no fear of perjury. Any one who saw Mr. John Effingham and Mr. Powis on that day, might have sworn that they were father and son; and any one who did not see Mr. Dodge might have said at once, that he did not belong to their family. That is all, sir; I never disparage a passenger, and therefore shall say no more than merely to add, that Mr. Dodge is no warrior."

"They say he has experienced religion lately, as they call it."

"It is high time, sir, for he had experienced sin quite long enough, according to my notion. I hear that the man goes up and down the country disparaging those whose shoe-ties he is unworthy to unloose, and that he has published some letters in his journal that are as false as his heart; but let him beware, lest the world should see, some rainy day, an extract from a certain log-book belonging to a ship called the Montauk. I am rejoiced at this marriage, after all, commodore, or marriages rather, for I understand that Mr. Paul Effingham and Sir George Templemore intend to make a double bow-line of it to-morrow morning. All is arranged, and as soon as my eyes have witnessed that blessed sight, I shall trip for New York again."

"It is clearly made out, then, that the young gentleman is Mr. John Effingham's son?"

"As clear as the north-star in a bright night. The fellow who spoke to me at the 'fun of fire,' has put me in a way to remove the last doubt, if there were any doubt. Mr. Effingham himself, who is so cool-headed and cautious, says there is now sufficient proof to make it good in any court in America. That point may be set down as settled, and for my part, I rejoice it is so; since Mr. John Effingham has so long passed for an old bachelor, that it is a credit to the corps to find one of them the father of so noble a son."

Here the commodore dropped his anchor, and the two friends began to fish. For an hour neither talked much, but having obtained the necessary stock of perch, they landed at the favourite spring, and prepared a fry. While seated on the grass, alternating between the potations of punch and the mastication of the fish, these worthies again renewed the dialogue in their usual discursive, philosophical, and sentimental manner.

"We are citizens of a surprisingly great country, commodore," commenced Mr. Truck, after one of his heaviest draughts; "everybody says it from Maine to Florida, and what everybody says must be true."

"Just so, sir. I sometimes wonder how so great a country ever came to produce so little a man as myself."

"A good cow may have a bad calf, and that explains the matter. Have you many as virtuous and pious women in this part of the world as Mrs. Abbot?"

"The hills and valleys are filled with them. You mean persons who have got so much religion, that they have no room for anything else?"

"I shall mourn to my dying day that you were not brought up to the sea! If you discover so much of the right material on fresh water, what would you have been on salt? The people who suck in nutriment from a brain and a conscience like those of Mr. Dodge, too, commodore, must get in time to be surprisingly clear-sighted."

"Just so, his readers soon overreach themselves. But it's of no great consequence, sir; the people of this part of the world keep nothing long enough to do much good or much harm with it."

"Fond of change, ha?"

"Like unlucky fishermen, always ready to shift the ground. I don't believe, sir, that in all this region you can find a dozen graves of sons, that lie near their fathers. Everybody seems to have a mortal aversion to stability."

"It is hard to love such a country, commodore!"

"Sir, I never try to love it. God has given me a pretty sheet of water, that suits my fancy and wants, a beautiful sky, fine green mountains, and I am satisfied. One may love God in such a temple, though he love nothing else."

“Well, I suppose if you love nothing, nothing loves you, and no injustice is done.”

“Just so, sir. Self has got to be the idol, though in the general scramble a man is sometimes puzzled to know whether he is himself, or one of the neighbours.”

“I wish I knew your political sentiments, commodore; you have been communicative on all subjects but that, and I have taken up the notion that you are a true philosopher.”

“I hold myself to be but a babe in swaddling clothes compared to yourself, sir, but such as my poor opinions are, you are welcome to them. In the first place, then, sir, I have lived long enough on this water to know that every man is a lover of liberty in his own person, and that he has a secret distaste for it in the persons of other people. Then, sir, I have got to understand that patriotism means bread and cheese, and that opposition is every man for himself.”

“If the truth were known, I believe, commodore, you have buoyed out the channel!”

“Just so. After being pulled about by the salt of the land, and using my freeman’s privileges at their command, until I got tired of so much liberty, sir, I have resigned, and retired to private life, doing most of my own thinking, out here on the Otsego-water, like a poor slave as I am.”

“You ought to be chosen the next President.”

“I owe my present emancipation, sir, to the Sogdollager. I first began to reason about such a man as this Mr. Dodge, who has thrust himself and his ignorance together into the village, lately, as an expounder of truth, and ray of light to the blind. Well, sir, I said to myself, if this man be the man I know him to be as a man, can he be anything better as an editor!”

“That was a home question put to yourself, commodore: how did you answer it?”

“The answer was satisfactory, sir, to myself, whatever it might be to other people. I stopped his paper, and set up for myself. Just about that time the Sogdollager nibbled, and instead of trying to be a great man over the shoulders of the patriots and sages of the land, I endeavoured to immortalize myself by hooking him. I go to the elections now, for that I feel to be a duty; but instead of allowing a man like this Mr. Dodge to tell me how to vote, I vote for the man in public that I would trust in private, and for no other.”

“Excellent; I honour you more and more every minute I pass in your society. We will now drink to the future happiness of those who will become brides and bridegrooms to-morrow. If all men were as philosophical and learned as you, commodore, the human race would be in a fairer way than they are to-day."

"Just so; I drink to them with all my heart. Is it not surprising, sir, that people like Mrs. Abbot and Mr. Dodge should have it in their power to injure such as those whose happiness we have just had the honour of commemorating in advance?"

"Why, commodore, a fly may bite an elephant, if he can find a weak spot in his hide. I do not altogether understand the history of the marriage of Mr. John Effingham myself, but we see the issue of it has been a fine son. Now I hold, that when a man fairly marries, he is bound to own it, the same as any other crime; for he owes it to those who have not been as guilty as himself, to show the world that he no longer belongs to them."

"Just so; but we have flies, in this part of the world, that will bite through the toughest hide."

"That comes from there being no quarterdeck in your social ship, commodore. Now aboard of a well-regulated packet all the thinking is done aft; they who are desirous of knowing whereabouts the vessel is, being compelled to wait till the observations are taken, or to sit down in their ignorance. The whole difficulty comes from the fact, that sensible people live so far apart, in this quarter of the world, that fools have more than an equal chance. You understand me, commodore?"

"Just so," said the commodore, laughing and winking; "well, it is fortunate that there are some people who are not quite as weakminded as some other people. I take it, Captain Truck, that you will be present at the wedding?"

The captain now winked in his turn, looked around him to make sure no one was listening, and laying a finger on his nose, he answered on a much lower key than was usual for him,—

"You can keep a secret, I know, commodore. Now, what I have to say is not to be told to Mrs Abbot, in order that it may be repeated and multiplied, but it is to be kept as snug as your bait in the bait-box."

"You know your man, sir."

"Well, then, about ten minutes before the clock strikes nine, to-morrow morning, do you slip into the gallery of New St. Paul's, and you shall see beauty and modesty, when 'unadorned, adorned the most.' You comprehend?"

"Just so;" and the hand was flourished even more than usual.

"It does not become us bachelors to be lenient to matrimony; but I should not be a happy man, were I not to witness the marriage of Paul Powis and Eve Effingham."

Here the two worthies "freshened their nip," as Captain Truck called it, and then the conversation became too philosophical and contemplative for this unpretending record of events and ideas.

CHAPTER XXIX.

Then plainly know, my heart's dear love is set
On the fair daughter of rich Capulet ;
As mine on hers, so hers is set on mine ;
And all combined, save what thou must combine
By holy marriage.

Romeo and Juliet.

The morning chosen for the nuptials of Eve and Grace arrived, and all the inmates of the Wigwam were early afoot, though the utmost care had been taken to prevent the intelligence of the approaching ceremony from getting into the village. They little knew, however, how closely they were watched, the mean artifices that were resorted to by some who called themselves their neighbours, to tamper with servants, to obtain food for conjecture, and to justify to themselves their exaggerations, falsehoods, and frauds. The news did leak out, as will presently be seen, and through a channel that may cause the reader, who is unacquainted with some of the peculiarities of American life, a little surprise.

We have frequently alluded to Annette, the femme de chambre that had followed Eve from Europe, although we have had no occasion to dwell on her character, which was that of a woman of her class, as that class is well known to exist in France. Annette was young, had bright sparkling black eyes, was well-made, and possessed the usual tournure and manner of a Parisian grisette. As it is the besetting weakness of provincial habits to mistake graces for grace, flourishes for elegance, and exaggeration for merit, Annette had soon acquired a reputation in her circle, as a woman of more than usual claims to distinction. Her attire was in the height of the fashion, and, being composed of Eve's cast-off clothes, was of the best materials; and attire is also a point that has unusual influence on those who are unaccustomed to the world.

As the double ceremony was to take place before breakfast, Annette was early employed about the person of her young mistress, adorning it in its bridal robes. As she worked at her usual employment, the attendant appeared unusually agitated, and several times pins were badly pointed, and new arrangements had to supersede or to supply the deficiencies of her mistakes. Eve was always a model of patience, and she bore these little oversights with a quiet that would have given Paul an additional pledge of her admirable self-command, as well as of a sweetness of temper that, in truth, raised her almost above the common failings of mortality.

“Vous êtes un peu agitée, ce matin, ma bonne Annette,” she merely observed, when her maid had committed a blunder more material than common.

“J’espère que Mademoiselle a été contente de moi jusqu’à présent!” returned Annette, vexed with her own awkwardness, and speaking in the manner in which it is usual to announce an intention to quit a service.

“Certainly, Annette, you have conducted yourself well, and are very expert in your métier. But why do you ask this question just at this moment?”

“Parce que—because—with Mademoiselle’s permission, I intended to ask for my congé.”

“Congé! Do you think of quitting me, Annette?”

“It would make me happier than anything else to die in the service of Mademoiselle, but we are all subject to our destiny,”—the conversation was in French,—“and mine compels me to cease my services as femme de chambre.”

“This is a sudden, and for one in a strange country, an extraordinary resolution. May I ask, Annette, what you propose to do?”

Here the woman gave herself many airs, endeavoured to blush, looked on the carpet with a studied modesty, that might have deceived one who did not know the genus, and announced her intention to get married, too, at the end of the present month.

“Married!” repeated Eve; “surely not to old Pierre, Annette?”

“Pierre, Mademoiselle! I shall not condescend to look at Pierre. Je vais me marier avec un avocat!”

“Un avocat!”

“Oui, Mademoiselle, I shall marry myself with Monsieur Aristobule Bragg, if Mademoiselle shall permit.”

Eve was mute with astonishment for a short time, notwithstanding the proofs she had seen of the wide range that the ambition of an American of a certain class allows itself. Of course she remembered the conversation on the Point, and it would not have been in nature, had not a mistress, who had been so lately wooed, felt some surprise at finding her discarded suitor so soon seeking consolation in the smiles of her maid. Still her surprise was less than the reader will probably experience at this announcement, for, as has been said, she had seen too much of the active and pliant enterprise of the lover, to feel much wonder at any of his moral tours de force. Even Eve, however, was not perfectly acquainted with the views and policy that had led Aristobulus to this consummation of all his matrimonial schemes, which must be explained explicitly, in order that they may be properly understood.

Mr. Bragg had no notion of any distinctions in the world, beyond those which come from money and political success. For the first he had a practical deference, that was as profound as his wishes for its enjoyments, and for the last he felt precisely the sort of reverence that one educated under a feudal system would feel for a feudal lord. The first, after several unsuccessful efforts, he had found unattainable by means of matrimony, and he had turned his thoughts towards Annette, whom he had for some months held in reserve, in the event of his failing with Eve and Grace, (for on both these heiresses had he entertained designs,) as a pis aller. Annette was a dressmaker of approved taste, her person was sufficiently attractive, her broken English gave poignancy to thoughts of no great depth, she was of a suitable age, and he had made his proposals, and had been accepted, as soon as it was ascertained that Eve and Grace were irretrievably lost to him. Of course the Parisienne did not hesitate an instant about becoming the wife of an avocat, for, agreeably to her habits, matrimony was a legitimate means of bettering her condition in life. Their plan was soon arranged. They were to be married as soon as Annette's month's notice had expired, and then they were to emigrate to the far West, where Mr. Bragg proposed to practice law, to keep school, or to go to Congress; or to turn trader, to keep tavern, or to saw lumber; or, in short, to turn his hand to anything that offered, while Annette was to help along with the ménage, by making dresses, and teaching French; the latter occupation promising to be somewhat peripatetic, the population being scattered, and few of the dwellers in the interior deeming it necessary to take more than a quarter's instruction in any of the higher branches of education, the object being to study, as it is called, and not to learn. Aristobulus, who was filled with go-a-headism, would have shortened the delay, but this Annette positively resisted, her esprit de corps, as a servant, and all her notions of justice, repudiating the notion that the connection which had existed so long between Eve and herself was to be cut off at a moment's warning. So diametrically were the ideas of the fiancés opposed to each other on this point, that at one time it threatened a rupture; Mr. Bragg asserting the natural independence of man, to a degree that would have rendered him independent of all obligations that were not effectually clenched by the law, and Annette maintaining the dignity of a European femme de chambre, whose sense of propriety demanded that she should not quit her place without giving a regular notice. The affair was happily decided by Aristobulus' receiving a commission to tend a store, in the absence of its owner; Mr. Effingham, at a hint from his daughter, having profited, by the annual expiration of his time, to bring their connexion to an end.

This termination to the passion of Mr. Bragg would have afforded Eve a good deal of amusement at any other moment, but a bride cannot be expected to give too much of her attention to the felicity and prospects of those who have no natural or acquired claims to her affection. The cousins met, attired for the ceremony, in Mr. Effingham's room, where he soon came in person, to lead them to the drawing-room. It is seldom that two more lovely young women were ever brought together on a similar occasion. As Mr. Effingham stood between them, holding a hand of each, his moistened eyes turned from one to the other, in an honest pride and admiration that even his tenderness could not restrain. The toilettes were, as simple as the marriage ceremony will permit for it was intended that there should be no unnecessary parade; and, perhaps, the delicate beauty of each of the brides was rendered the more attractive by this simplicity, as it has often been justly remarked that the fair of this country are more winning in dress of a less conventional character than when in the elaborate and regulated attire of ceremonies. As might have been expected, there was most of soul and feeling in Eve's countenance, though Grace wore an air of charming modesty and nature. Both were unaffected, simple, and graceful, and we may add that both trembled as Mr. Effingham took their hands.

"This is a pleasing and yet a painful hour," said that kind and excellent man; "one in which I gain a son, and lose a daughter."

"And I, dearest uncle," exclaimed Grace, whose feelings trembled on her eye-lids, like the dew ready to drop from the leaf, "have I no connexion with your feelings?"

"You are the daughter that I lose, my child, for Eve will still remain with me. But Templemore has promised to be grateful, and I will trust to his word."

Mr. Effingham then embraced with fervour both the charming young women, who stood apparelled for the most important event in their lives, lovely in their youth, beauty, innocence, and modesty, and, taking an arm of each, he led them below. John Effingham, the two bridegrooms, Captain Ducie, Mr. and Mrs. Bloomfield, Mrs. Hawker, Captain Truck, Mademoiselle Viefville, Annette and Anne Sidley, were all assembled in the drawing-room, ready to receive them; and as soon as shawls were thrown round Eve and Grace, in order to conceal their wedding dresses, the whole of the party proceeded to the church.

The distance between the Wigwam and New St. Paul's was very trifling, the solemn pines of the church-yard blending with the gayer trees of the grounds of the former, from many points; and as the buildings in this part of the village were few, the whole of the bridal train entered the tower unobserved by the eyes of the curious. The clergyman was waiting in the chancel, and as each of the young men led the object of his choice immediately to the altar, the double ceremony began without any delay. At this instant, Aristobulus, Mr. Dodge, and Mrs. Abbot advanced from the rear of the gallery, and coolly took their seats in its front. Neither belonged to this particular church, though, having discovered that the marriages were to take place this morning, by means of Annette, they had no scruple on the score of delicacy about thrusting themselves forward on the occasion; for, to the latest moment, the publicity principle, which appeared to be interwoven with their very natures, induced them to think that nothing was so sacred as to be placed beyond the reach of their rabid curiosity. They entered the church, because a church they held to be a public place, precisely on the principle that others of their class conceive if a gate be blown open by accident, it removes all the moral defences against trespassers, in removing the physical.

The solemn language of the prayers and vows proceeded none the less for the presence of these unwelcome intruders, for at that grave moment all other thoughts were hushed in those that more properly belonged to the scene. As the clergyman made the usual appeal to know if any man could give a reason why those who stood before him should not be united in holy wedlock, Mrs. Abbot nudged Mr. Dodge, and, in the fulness of her discontent, sagely inquired in a whisper if it were not possible to raise some valid objection. Could she have had her pious wish, the simple, unpretending, meek, and church-going Eve should never be married at all. But the editor was not a man to act openly in anything, his particular province being insinuations and innuendoes. As a hint would not now be available, he determined to postpone his revenge to a future day. We say revenge, for Steadfast was of that class that consider any happiness or advantage, in which they are not ample participators, as a wrong done to themselves.

It is a wise regulation of the church, that which makes the marriage ceremony brief; for the intensity of the feelings it often creates would frequently become too powerful to be suppressed, were it unnecessarily prolonged. Mr. Effingham gave away both the brides, the one in the quality of parent, the other in that of guardian, and neither of the bridegrooms got the ring on the wrong finger. This is all we have to say of the immediate scene at the altar. As soon as the benediction was pronounced, and the brides were released from the first embraces of their husbands, Mr. Effingham, without even kissing Eve, threw the shawls over their shoulders, and, taking an arm of each, he led them both rapidly from the church, for he felt reluctant to suffer the holy feelings that were uppermost in his heart to be the spectacle of rude and intrusive observers. At the door he relinquished Eve to Paul, and Grace to Sir George, with a silent pressure of the hand of each, and signed for them to proceed swiftly towards the Wigwam. He was obeyed, and in less than a quarter of an hour from the time they had left the drawing-room, the whole party were again assembled in it.

What a change had been produced in the situation of so many in that brief interval!

"Father," Eve whispered as Mr. Effingham folded her to his heart, while the unbidden tears fell from both their eyes, "I am still thine!"

"It would break my heart to think otherwise, darling. No, no; I have not lost a daughter, but have gained a son."

"And what place am I to occupy in this scene of fondness?" inquired John Effingham, who had considerably paid his compliments to Grace first, that she might not feel forgotten at such a moment, and who had so managed that she was now receiving the congratulations of the rest of the party; "am I to lose both son and daughter?"

Eve, smiling sweetly through her tears, raised herself from her own father's arms, and was received in those of her husband's parent. After he had fondly kissed her forehead several times, without withdrawing from his bosom, she parted the rich hair on his forehead, passing her hand down his face like an infant, and said softly,

"Cousin Jack!"

"I believe this must be my rank and estimation still. Paul shall make no difference in our feelings, but we will love each other, as we have ever done."

"Paul can be nothing now between you and me. You have always been a second father in my eyes and in my heart. Dear, dear, cousin Jack."

John Effingham pressed the beautiful, ardent, blushing girl to his bosom again, and, as he did so, both felt, notwithstanding their language, that a new and dearer tie than ever bound them together. Eve now received the compliments of the rest of the party, when the two brides retired to change the dresses in which they had appeared at the altar for their more ordinary attire.

In her own dressing-room, Eve found Anne Sidley waiting with impatience to pour out her feelings, for the honest and affectionate creature was too sensitive to open the flood-gates of her affections in the presence of third parties.

“Ma’am—Miss Eve—Mrs. Effingham!” she exclaimed, as soon as her young mistress entered; afraid of saying too much now that her nurseling had become a married woman.

“My kind and good Nanny!” and Eve took her old nurse in her arms, their tears mingling in silence for near a minute. “You have seen your child enter on the last of her great earthly engagements, Nanny, and I know that you pray that they may prove happy ones.”

“I do—I do—ma’am, madam, Miss Eve,—What am I to call you in future, ma’am?”

“Call me Miss Eve, as you have done since my childhood, dearest Nanny.”

Nanny received this permission with delight, and twenty times that morning she availed herself of it. She continued to use the term until, two years later, she danced a miniature Eve on her knee, as she had done its mother, when matronly rank began silently to assert its rights, and our present bride became Mrs. Effingham.

“I shall not quit you, ma’am, now that you are married?” Anne timidly asked, for although she could scarcely think such an event within the bounds of probability, and Eve had already more than once assured her to the contrary, still did she love to make assurance doubly sure. “I hope nothing will ever happen to make me quit you, ma’am.”

“Nothing of that sort, with my consent, ever shall happen, my excellent Nanny. And now that Annette is about to get married, I shall have more than the usual necessity for your services.”

“And Mamerzelle, ma’am?” inquired Nanny with sparkling eyes; “I suppose she, too, will return to her own country, now you know everything, and have no farther occasion for her?”

“Mademoiselle Vieffville will return to France in the autumn, but it will be with us all; for my dear father, cousin Jack, my husband—” Eve blushed as she pronounced the novel word, “and myself, not forgetting you, my old nurse, shall all sail for England, with Sir George and Lady Templemore, on our way to Italy, the first week in October.”

“I care not, ma’am, so that I go with you. I would rather we did not live in a country where I cannot understand all that the people say to you, but wherever you are, will be my earthly paradise.”

Eve once more kissed the true-hearted woman, and Annette entering she changed her dress.

The two brides met at the head of the great stairs, on their way back to the drawing-room. Eve was a little in advance, but, with a half-concealed smile, she gave way to Grace, curtsying gravely, and saying,—

“It does not become me to precede Lady Templemore—I who am only Mrs. Paul Effingham.”

“Nay, dear Eve, I am not so weak as you imagine. Do you not think I should have married him had he not been a baronet?”

“Templemore, my dear coz, is a man any woman might love, and I believe as firmly as I hope it sincerely, that he will make you happy.”

“And yet there is one woman who would not love him, Eve!”

Eve looked steadily at her cousin, for a moment startled; and then she felt gratified that Sir George had been so honest, for the frankness and manliness of his avowal was a pledge of the good faith and sincerity of his character: she took her cousin affectionately by the hand, and said,—

“Grace, this confidence is the highest compliment you can pay me, and it merits a return. That Sir George Templemore may have had a passing inclination for one who so little deserved it, may be true; but my heart was another’s long before I knew him.”

“You never would have married Templemore, coz; he says himself, now, that you are quite too continental, as he calls it, to like an Englishman.”

“Then I shall take the first good occasion to undeceive him, for I do like an Englishman, and he is the identical man.”

As few women are jealous on their wedding-days, Grace took this in good part, and they descended the stairs together, side by side, reflecting each other’s happiness in their timid but heartfelt smiles. In the great hall they were met by the bridegrooms, and each taking the arm of him who had now become of so vast importance to her, they paced the room to and fro until summoned to the déjeuner à la fourchette which had been prepared under the especial superintendence of Mademoiselle Vieville, after the manner of her country.

Wedding-days, like all formally prepared festivals, are apt to go off a little heavily. Such, however, was not the case with this, for every appearance of premeditation and preparation vanished with this meal. It is true the family did not quit the ground, but, with this exception, ease and tranquil happiness reigned throughout. Captain Truck was alone disposed to be sentimental, and more than once, as he looked about him, he expressed his doubts whether he had pursued the right course to attain happiness.

"I find myself in a solitary category," he said, at the dinner-table in the evening. "Mrs. Hawker and both the Mr. Effinghams have been married; everybody else is married, and I believe I must take refuge in saying I will be married, if I can persuade any one to have me. Even Mr. Powis, my right hand man in all that African affair, has deserted me, and left me like a single dead pine in one of your clearings, or a jewel-block dangling at a yard arm, without a sheave. Mrs. Bride—" the captain styled Eve thus throughout the day, to the utter neglect of the claims of Lady Templemore—"Mrs. Bride, we will consider my forlorn condition more philosophically, when I shall have the honour to take you and so many of this blessed party back again to Europe, where I found you. Under your advice I think I might even yet venture."

"And I am overlooked entirely," cried Mr. Howel, who had been invited to make one at the wedding-feast. "What is to become of me, Captain Truck, if this marrying mania go any further?"

"I have long had a plan for your welfare, my dear sir, that I will take this opportunity to divulge. I propose, ladies and gentlemen, that we enlist Mr. Howel in our project for this autumn, and that we carry him with us to Europe. I shall be proud to have the honour of introducing him to his old friend the island of Great Britain."

"Oh! that is a happiness, I fear, that is not in reserve for me!" said Mr. Howel plaintively. "I have thought of these things in my time, I confess, but age will now defeat any such hopes."

"Age, Tom Howel!" said John Effingham; "you are but fifty, like Ned and myself. We were all boys together forty years ago; and yet you find us, who have so lately returned, ready to take a fresh departure. Pluck up heart; there may be a steam-boat ready to bring you back by the time you wish to return."

"Never!" said Captain Truck, positively. "Ladies and gentlemen, it is morally impossible that the Atlantic should ever be navigated by steamers. That doctrine I shall maintain to my dying day; but what need of a steamer when we have packets like palaces?"

"I did not know, Captain, that you entertained so hearty a respect for Great Britain.—It is encouraging, really, to find so generous a feeling toward the old island in one of her descendants. Sir George and Lady Templemore, permit me to drink to your lasting felicity."

"Ay, ay, I entertain no ill will to England, though her tobacco laws are none of the gentlest. But my wish to export you, Mr. Howel, is less from a desire to show you England, than to let you perceive that there are other countries in Europe—”

“Other countries!—Surely you do not suppose that I am so ignorant of geography as to believe that there are no other countries in Europe—no such places as Hanover, Brunswick, and Brunswick Lunenburg, and Denmark; the sister of old George the Third married the king of that country; and Wurtemberg, the king of which married the Princess Royal.”

“And Mecklenburg-Strelitz,” added John Effingham gravely, “a princess of which actually married George the Third in propria personâ, as well as by proxy. Nothing can be plainer than your geography, Howel: but, in addition to these particular regions, our worthy friend the captain wishes you to know also that there are such places as France, and Austria, and Russia, and Italy, though the latter can scarcely repay a man for the trouble of visiting it.”

“You have guessed my motive, Mr. John Effingham, and expressed it more discreetly than I could possibly have done,” cried the captain. “If Mr. Howel will do me the favour to take passages with me, going and coming, I shall consider the pleasure of his remarks on men and things as one of the greatest advantages I ever possessed.”

“I do not know but I might be induced to venture as far as England, but not a foot farther.”

“Pas à Paris! exclaimed Mademoiselle Viefville, who wondered why any rational being would take the trouble to cross the Atlantic merely to see ce mélancolique Londres. “You will go to Paris, for my sake, Mr. Howel?”

“For your sake, indeed, I would do anything; but hardly for my own. I confess I have thought of this, and I will think of it farther. I should like to see the King of England, and the House of Lords, I confess, before I die.”

“Ay, and the Tower, and the Boar’s Head at East Cheap, and the statue of the Duke of Wellington, and London Bridge, and Richmond Hill, and Bow-street, and Somerset House, and Oxford Road, and Bartlemy Fair, and Hungerford Market, and Charing Cross,—old Charing Cross, Tom Howel,” added John Effingham, with a good-natured nod of the head.

“A wonderful nation!” cried Mr. Howel, whose eyes sparkled as the other proceeded. “I do not think, after all, that I can die in peace without having seen some of these things; all would be too much for me. How far is the Isle of Dogs from St. Catherine’s Docks, captain?”

“Oh! but a few cables’ lengths. If you will only stick to the ship until she is fairly docked, I will promise you a sight of the Isle of Dogs before you land, even. But then you must promise me to carry out no tobacco."

"No fear of me; I neither smoke nor chew, and it does not surprise me that a nation so polished as the English should have this antipathy to tobacco. And one might really see the Isle of Dogs before landing! It is a wonderful country! Mrs. Bloomfield, will you ever be able to die tranquilly without seeing England?"

"I hope, sir, whenever that event shall arrive, that it may be met tranquilly let what may happen previously. I do confess, in common with Mrs. Effingham, a longing desire to see Italy; a wish that I believe she entertains from her actual knowledge, and which I entertain from my bright anticipations."

"Now, this really surprises me. What can Italy possess to repay for the trouble of travelling so far?"

"I trust, cousin Jack," said Eve, colouring at the sound of her own voice, for on that day of extreme happiness and intense emotions she had become so sensitive as to be less self-possessed than common, "that our friend Mr. Wenham may not be forgotten, but that he may be invited to join the party."

This representation of la jeune Amérique was also present at the dinner, out of regard to his deceased father, who was a very old friend of Mr. Effingham; and being so favourably noticed by the bride, he did not fail to reply.

"I believe an American has little to learn from any nation but his own," observed Mr. Wenham, with the complacency of the school to which he belonged, "although one might wish that all of this country should travel, in order that the rest of the world might have the benefit of the intercourse."

"It is a thousand pities," said John Effingham, "that one of our universities, for instance, was not ambulant. Old Yale was in its infancy; but, unlike most other creatures, it went about with greater ease to itself when a child than it can now move with in full manhood."

"Mr. John Effingham loves to be facetious," said Mr. Wenham with dignity; for while he was as credulous as could be wished on the subject of American superiority, he was not quite so bland as the votaries of the Anglo-American school, who usually yield the control of all their faculties and common sense to their masters on the points connected with their besetting weakness. "Everybody is agreed, I believe, that the American imparts more than he receives, in his intercourse with Europeans."

The smiles of the more experienced of this young man's listeners were well bred and concealed, and the conversation turned to other subjects. It was easy to raise the laugh on such an occasion, and, contrary to the usages of the Wigwam, where the men usually left the table with the other sex, Captain Truck, John Effingham, Mr. Bloomfield, and Mr. Howel made what is called a night of it. Much delicious claret was consumed, and the honest captain was permitted to enjoy his segar. About midnight he swore he had half a mind to write a letter to Mrs. Hawker, with an offer of his hand; as for his heart, that she well knew she had possessed for a long time.

The next day, about the hour when the house was tranquil, from the circumstance that most of its inmates were abroad on their several avocations of boating, riding, shopping, or walking, Eve was in the library, her father having left it a few minutes before to mount his horse. She was seated at a table, writing a letter to an aged relative of her own sex, to communicate the circumstance of her marriage. The door was half open, and Paul appeared at it unexpectedly, coming in search of his young bride. His step had been so light, and so intently was our heroine engaged with her letter, that his approach was unnoticed, though it had now been a long time since the ear of Eve had learned to know his tread, and her heart to beat at its welcome sound. Perhaps a beautiful woman is never so winningly lovely as when, in her neat morning attire, she seems fresh and sweet as the newborn day. Eve had paid a little more attention to her toilette than usual even, admitting just enough of a properly selected jewellery, a style of ornament that so singularly denotes the refinement of a gentlewoman when judiciously used, and which as infallibly betrays vulgarity under other circumstances. Her morning attire had rather more than the customary finish, though it was impossible not to perceive at a glance that she was in an undress. The Parisian skill of Annette, on which Mr. Bragg based so many of his hopes of future fortune, had cut and fitted the robe to her faultlessly beautiful person with a tact, or it might be truer to say a contact, so perfect, that it even left more charms to be imagined than it displayed, though the outline of the whole figure was that of the most lovely womanhood. But, notwithstanding the exquisite modeling of the whole form, the almost fairy lightness of the full, swelling, but small foot, about which nothing seemed lean and attenuated, and the exquisite hand that appeared from among the ruffles of the dress, Paul stood lost in almost breathless admiration of the countenance of his "bright and blooming bride." Perhaps there is no sentiment so touchingly endearing to a man as that which comes over him as he contemplates the beauty, confiding faith, holy purity and truth that shine in the countenance of a young, unpractised, innocent woman, when she has so far overcome her natural timidity as to pour out her tenderness in his behalf, and to submit to the strongest impulses of her nature. Such was now the fact with Eve. She was writing of her husband; and though her expressions were restrained by modesty, taste, and education, they partook of her unutterable fondness and devotion. The tears stood in her eyes, the pen trembled in her hand, and she shaded her face as if to conceal the weakness from herself. Paul was alarmed, he knew not why; but Eve in tears was a painful sight to him. In a moment he was at her side, with an arm placed gently around her waist, as he drew her fondly towards his bosom.

“Eve—dearest Eve!” he said, “what mean these tears?”

The serene eye, the radiant blush, and the meek tenderness that rewarded his own burst of feeling, reassured the husband, and, deferring to the sensitive modesty of so young a bride, he released his hold, retaining only a hand.

“It is happiness, Powis,—nothing but excess of happiness, which makes us women weaker, I fear, than even sorrow.”

Paul kissed both her eyes, regarded her a moment with an intensity of admiration, before which the eyes of Eve rose and fell, as if dazzled while meeting his looks, and yet unwilling to lose them, and then he reverted to the motive which brought him to the library.

“My father—your father that is now—”

“Cousin Jack!”

“Cousin Jack, if you will, has just made me a present which is second only to the greater gift I received from your own excellent parent yesterday at the altar. See, dearest Eve, he has bestowed this lovely image of yourself on me; lovely, though still so far from the truth. And here is the miniature of my poor mother also, to supply the place of the one carried away by the Arabs.”

Eve gazed long and wistfully at the beautiful features of this image of her husband's mother. She traced in them that gentle thought, that winning kindness that had at first softened her heart towards Paul, and her lips trembled as she pressed the insensible glass against them.

“She must have been very handsome, Eve, and there is a look of melancholy tenderness in the face, that would seem almost to predict an unhappy blighting of the affections.”

“And yet this young, ingenuous, faithful woman entered on the solemn engagement we have just made, Paul, with as many reasonable hopes of a bright future as we ourselves!”

“Not so, Eve—confidence and holy truth were wanting at the nuptials of my parents. When there is deception at the commencement of a contract, it is not difficult to predict the end.”

"I do not think, Paul, you ever deceived; that heart of yours is too generous!"

"If anything can make a man worthy of such a love, dearest, it is the noble and absorbing confidence with which your sex throw themselves on the justice and faith of ours. Did that spotless heart ever entertain a doubt of the worth of any living being on which it had set its affections?"

"Of itself, often, dear Paul, and they say self-love is at the bottom of all our actions."

"You are the last person to hold this doctrine, beloved, for those who live most in your confidence declare that all traces of self are lost in your very nature."

"Most in my confidence! my dear kind father has then been betraying his besetting weakness, by extolling the gift he has made."

"Your excellent father knows too well the total want of necessity for any such thing. If the truth must be confessed, I have been passing a quarter of an hour with the worthy Anne Sidley."

"Nanny—dear old Nanny!—and you have been weak enough, traitor, to listen to the eulogiums of a nurse on her child!"

"All praise of thee, my blessed Eve, is grateful to my ears, and who can speak more confidently of those domestic qualities which lie at the root of domestic bliss, than those who have seen you in your most intimate life, from childhood down to the moment when you have assumed the duties of a wife?"

"Paul, Paul, thou art beside thyself; too much learning hath made thee mad!"

"I am not mad, most beloved and beautiful Eve, but blessed to a degree that might indeed upset a stronger reason."

"We will now talk of other things," said Eve, raising his hand to her lips in respectful affection, and looking gratefully up into his fond and eloquent eyes; "I hope the awkwardness of which you so lately spoke has subsided, and that you no longer feel yourself a stranger in the dwelling of your own family."

"Now that I can claim a right through you, I confess my conscience is getting to be easier on this point. Have you been yet told of the arrangement that the older heads meditate in reference to our future means?"

"I would not listen to my dear father when he wished to introduce the subject, for I found that it was a project that made distinctions between Paul Effingham and Eve Effingham, two that I wish henceforth to consider as one in all things."

"In this, darling, you may do yourself injustice, as well as me. But perhaps you may not wish me to speak on the subject neither."

“What would my lord?”

“Then listen, and the tale is soon told. We are each other's natural heirs. Of the name and blood of Effingham, neither has a relative nearer than the other, for, though but cousins in the third degree, our family is so small as to render the husband, in this case, the natural heir of the wife, and the wife the natural heir of the husband. Now your father proposes that his estates be valued, and that my father settle on you a sum of equal amount, which his wealth will fully enable him to do, and that I become the possessor in reversion of the lands that would otherwise have been yours.”

“You possess me, my heart, my affections, my duty, and of what account is money after this!”

“I perceive that thou art so much and so truly woman, Eve, that we must arrange all this without consulting thee at all.”

“Can I be in safer hands?—a father that has always been too indulgent of my unreasonable wishes; a second parent that has only contributed too much to spoil me in the same thoughtless manner—and a—”

“Husband,” added Paul, perceiving that Eve hesitated at pronouncing to his face a name so novel though so endearing, “who will strive to do more than either in the unprofitable task.”

“Husband,” she added, looking up into his face with a smile as innocent as that of an infant, while the crimson tinged her forehead, “if the formidable word must be uttered, that is doing all he can to increase a self-esteem that is already so much greater than it ought to be.”

A light tap at the door caused Eve to start, and to look embarrassed, like one detected in a fault. Paul released the hand that he had continued to hold during their brief dialogue.

“Sir—ma'am—” said the timid, meek voice of Anne Sidley, as she held the door ajar, without presuming to look into the room, “Miss Eve—Mr. Powis!”

“Enter, my good Nanny,” said Eve, recovering her self-composure in a moment, the presence of her nurse always appearing to her as no more than a duplication of herself. “What is your wish?”

“I hope I am not unreasonable, but I knew that Mr. Effingham was alone with you here, and I wished—that is ma'am—Miss Eve,—sir—”

“Speak your wishes, my good old nurse;—am I not your own child—and is not this your own child's—” again Eve hesitated, blushed, and smiled, ere she pronounced the word “husband!”

“Yes, ma'am, and God be praised that it is so. I dreamt,—it is now four years, Miss Eve, we were then travelling among the Denmarkers, and I dreamt that you were married to a great prince—”

“But your dream has not come true, my good Nanny, and you see by this fact, that it is not safe to trust in dreams.”

“Ma’am, I do not esteem princes by their kingdoms and crowns, but by their qualities—and if Mr. Powis be not a prince, who is?”

“That, indeed, changes the matter,” said the gratified young wife, “and I believe, after all, dear Nanny, that I must become a convert to your theory of dreams.”

“While I must always deny it, good Mrs. Sidley, if this is a specimen of its truth,” said Paul, laughing. “But perhaps this prince proved unworthy of Miss Eve, after all?”

“Not he, sir; he made her a most kind and affectionate husband; not humoring all her idle wishes like, if Miss Eve could have had such wishes, but cherishing her, and counselling her, and protecting her, showing as much tenderness for her as her own father, and as much love for her as I had myself.”

“In which case, my worthy nurse, he proved an invaluable husband,” said Eve, with glistening eyes; “and I trust, too, that he was considerate and friendly to you?”

“He took me by the hand the morning after the marriage, and said, ‘Faithful Anne Sidley, you have nursed and attended my beloved when a child and as a young lady, and I now entreat you will continue to wait on and serve her as a wife to your dying day.’ He did, indeed, ma’am, and I think I can now hear the very words he spoke so kindly. The dream, so far, has come good.”

“My faithful Anne,” said Paul smiling, and taking the hand of the nurse, “you have been all that is good and true to my best beloved as a child and as a young lady, and I now earnestly entreat you to continue to wait on her, and to serve her as my wife, to your dying day.”

Nanny clapped her hands with a scream of delight, and bursting into tears, she exclaimed, as she hurried from the room, “It has all come true—it has all come true!”

A pause of several minutes succeeded this burst of superstitious and natural feeling.

“All who live near you appear to think you the common centre of their affections,” Paul continued when he could speak.

“We have hitherto been a family of love.—God grant it may always continue so.”

Another delicious silence, which lasted still longer than the other, followed. Eve then looked up into her husband’s face with a gentle curiosity, and observed—

“ You have told me a great deal, Powis, explained all but one little thing, that at the time caused me pain. Why did Ducie, when you were about to quit the Montauk together, so unceremoniously stop you, as you were about to get into the boat first?—is the etiquette of a man-of-war so rigid, as to justify so much rudeness, I had almost called it?”

“ The etiquette of a vessel of war is rigid certainly, and wisely so; but what you fancied rudeness was in truth a compliment. Among us sailors, it is the inferior who goes first into a boat, and the superior that quits it first. ”

“ So much then for forming a judgment ignorantly; I believe it is always safer to have no opinion, than to form one without a perfect knowledge of all the accompanying circumstances. ”

“ Let us adhere to this safe rule through life, beloved, and we may find its benefits. An absolute confidence, caution in drawing conclusions, and a just reliance on each other, may keep us as happy to the end of our married life as we are at this blessed moment, when it may be said to commence. ”

THE END.

"I have told me a great deal, I told, explained all but one little thing. That at the time caused me pain. Why did I do that, when you were about to quit the Mountain together, so unconsciously stop you, as you were about to quit the boat first?—is the principle of a man of war so tight, as to justify so much indifference, I had almost asked if?"

"The principle of a vessel of war is tight certainly, and wisely so; but what you touched, tenderness was in truth a compliment. Among us sailors, it is the indicator who goes first into a boat, and the superior that pulls it first."

"So much then for forming a judgment ignorantly; I believe it is always safer to have no opinion, than to form one without a perfect knowledge of all the accompanying circumstances."

"Let us adhere to this rule, though little, beloved, and we may find its benefit. An absolute command, caution in drawing conclusions, and a just reliance on each other, may keep us as happy to the end of our married life as we are at this blessed moment, when it may be said to commence."
